Counsel, in opening the appeal, made a point which, at first sight, rather caught me. He said that such covenants as these are personal covenants. I do not think that they are, if you spell them through. Then he said that there was no covenant which the assignees could "well and truly observe," because there was no obligation thrown upon them at all. If that were so, and if it were that the present tenants of the hotel, without being bound by any covenant, merely for their own convenience happened to buy wines and spirits from the present owners of the wine and spirit merchant's business, I should have great doubt whether this proviso for reduction of the rent did apply to those tenants. But the whole difficulty which gave rise to that argument disappears when you come to the conclusion—as I have done—that the present tenants of the hotel are bound by the covenant. Then it is manifest that the proviso applies. We are asked to say whether, inasmuch as the present tenants have bought wine and spirits from the successors in business of the lessor, they are entitled to the abatement from their rent. A

The learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that they are, although he did not rest his decision upon the ground that they were bound by the covenant, and seems to have thought that they would be entitled to the abatement whether they were bound by the covenant or not. I am not prepared to go so far as that. But, coming to the conclusion as I have, that they are bound by the covenant, and that the proviso for abatement from the rent exactly hits the case, it appears to me that the learned judge is right. Counsel for the plaintiffs has drawn our attention to various authorities, and he has suggested that, inasmuch as the title to the reversion is in one set of persons, and the title to the wine and spirit business is in another set, the covenant cannot be enforced now by the owners of the reversion. My answer is: Look at the terms of it. It appears to me that the learned judge in the court below is right, though, as I have already said, I prefer to base my decision on somewhat different grounds from those upon which he founded his decision. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed with costs. C
D

A. L. SMITH, L.J. I am of the same opinion. This is an originating summons taken out by the executors and trustees of the lessor against the assignees of the lessee, asking whether the defendants are entitled to an abatement from the rent. The defendants say: "In the lease under which we are tenants of the hotel, there is a covenant which binds us, namely, a covenant not to take our wine and spirits except from the lessor of the hotel, or his successors or assigns, and if we perform that covenant our rent is not to be £1,500 a year, but is to be £1,200 a year." But it is said in answer that, though those are the terms of the lease, stated shortly, there is only a personal covenant by the lessee that he will take wines and spirits from the lessor during the term created by the lease, and that that did not bind the defendants as the assignees; that, inasmuch as the lease had been assigned by the lessee, the covenant is gone; that the covenant having gone, the proviso which was appendant to the covenant is gone also; and that, therefore, the original contracted rent of £1,500 has now to be paid, and not the £1,200, although the assignees are willing and ready to perform the covenant and take their wines and spirits from the successors in business of the lessor. E
G

The first point to be determined is, whether or not that construction of the lease is correct. The first question is, whether the covenant in question runs with the land. Many authorities have been cited, but I think that I may take three—which are the three most pertinent ones—to show that a covenant like that, namely, to use premises in a particular way (as here to use premises solely for selling wines and spirits obtained from the lessor or his successor or successors), attaches to the property demised so as to be a covenant running with the land, even although the word "assigns" is not to be found in the covenant by the lessee. The cases to which I allude are Tatem v. Chaplin (1), Clegg v. Hands (2), and Fleetwood v. Hull (3). The last of those cases was decided by my brother CHARLES, in which most of the authorities upon this subject are summed-up. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion—as LINDLEY, L.J., has done—that it is a covenant running with the land, the burden of which binds the assignees of the lease. When once you arrive at that, it is perfectly obvious that the proviso "that so long as the lessee shall well and truly observe the covenant on his part," is a proviso to the benefit of which the assignees of the lessee are entitled. The executors and trustees of the lessor must allow a rebate of £75 from each quarterly payment of the rent, amounting altogether to £300 a year. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. H
I

A RIGBY, L.J.—In this case counsel for the plaintiffs has not, in my judgment, succeeded in displacing the authorities which have been cited against him, tending to show that a covenant of this sort, under ordinary circumstances, runs with the land so as to be binding upon an assignee. It is the nature of a covenant which determines whether it shall run with the land or not, far more than the question whether assigns are mentioned or not. There are some intermediate cases in which you do not really know, from the nature of the case, whether it is intended to extend beyond the first lessee. I think, for instance, a covenant not to assign without licence is construed differently, whether you do or do not mention the word “assigns,” that is to say, if the lessee only covenants not to assign without licence. I am under the impression—and I think I am right—that, after once the licence has been given, the assignee is not subject to the original terms. But where, as here, you find a covenant of such a nature that it affects directly the use of the demised premises in a manner which the lessor chooses to assume will be beneficial to him, it seems to me that, in accordance with general principles, it ought to run with the land, whether the word “assigns” is mentioned or not.

C I agree that upon this covenant relating to a wine merchant’s business, the successors in business of Sir Thomas White can have no right to sue. They have no right to sue upon this covenant, nor could it be given to them. If the covenant had been assigned, in the most express manner, by the lessor or his executors and trustees, they would have got nothing by it. You cannot impose upon a lessee an obligation to a man to whom he has undertaken no obligation at all. But that is not the point. The question is: Is this an existing covenant, and an existing covenant which the executors and trustees of Sir Thomas White could enforce now against the present tenants of the premises under this lease? I think that they could; and I am inclined to think that they could do so, if for no other reason, because the covenant is that the lessee is not to sell any wines or spirits unless they are provided by or through the lessor, his successors or assigns. There is no reason why a lessor should not say to his lessee: “I will provide you with spirits, but, of course, I give you the opportunity of getting those spirits, if you like, from my successors in business.” I see no reason why, if the lessee absolutely refused to comply with that covenant, there should not be an action for breach of it; and I do not say that that action would necessarily involve nominal damages only, though perhaps that is not important.

E When we have got so far and turn to the proviso, we find it is, “so long as the lessee shall well and truly observe the covenant on his part lastly hereinbefore contained.” For the purpose of this argument, at any rate, it is admitted that the defendants have, down to the present time, duly observed that covenant, if it be an existing covenant. They have taken their wines and spirits from the successors of the business of Sir Thomas White, and there is no allegation that they have committed a breach of the covenant. When we get over that difficulty, it seems to me that the present lessees, as they were liable for the burden of the covenant, are entitled to the advantage intended to be conferred by the proviso. It is a proviso relating to the rent of the property, and, therefore, in a very important manner, relating to the property itself. My first leaning towards the construction that has been put upon this case by the defendants arose from this, that it was apparent to me that that proviso at any rate would run with the land, and it did not require very much more to satisfy me that the covenant would run with the land also. I think that the declaration made by the learned judge in the court below was correct, and I am all the more satisfied about that because I think that the rent of £1,500 never was intended between the parties to the lease to be the rent at all. I think it is very likely that the £1,200 was the rent from the first, and that they put in the figure £1,500 with an abatement of £300 in order to make a compliance with these terms more easily secured.

BULLI COAL MINING CO. v. OSBORNE AND ANOTHER

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord James of Hereford),

Limitation of Action—Equitable remedy—Fraud—Trespass—Coal mine—Surreptitious taking of coal from under neighbouring land.

A court of equity, though not within the words of a statute of limitation which only applies to certain legal remedies, is within its spirit and meaning, with the result that in any particular case the statute is as binding in equity as it is in law.

Accordingly, in an action for trespass, the cause of action being the surreptitious and fraudulent taking by the defendants of coal from under the plaintiffs' land,

Held: it had always been a principle of equity that no length of time was a bar to relief in the case of fraud in the absence of laches on the part of the person defrauded, and, therefore, the statute of limitations did not apply to bar the plaintiffs' claim in the present case.

Per CURIAM: The contention that the statute was a bar unless the wrongdoer was proved to have taken active measures to prevent detection was opposed to common sense as well as to the principles of equity.

Appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (DARLEY, C.J., STEPHEN and MANNING, JJ.) affirming an order of the Chief Judge in Equity (OWEN, J.): see 17 N.S.W.L.R., Eq. 242; and 18 N.S.W.L.R., Eq. 475.

D The order was made on a summons by the respondents for leave to prove in the winding-up of the appellant company for £45,642 15s., the estimated value of coal wrongfully taken by the appellants from under land of the respondents. The appellants contended that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations.

Mar. 11, 1899. LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD. --In this case the appellants seek to reverse a judgment or order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, dated Sept. 10, 1897, dismissing an appeal against an order of the Hon. William Owen, Chief Judge in Equity, dated July 27, 1896, and allowing a cross-appeal on the part F of the respondents against the said order and varying it in certain particulars.

The proceedings in the courts below were commenced by a summons issued by the respondents in the winding-up of the appellant company for liberty to prove for a sum of money claimed as the value of coal alleged to have been wrongfully taken by the appellants from land belonging to the respondents. Such claim was, by an order dated Dec. 20, 1895, directed to be tried before the Chief Judge in Equity, and G it was accordingly heard before him in April, May, and June, 1896. On July 27, 1896, the learned judge delivered judgment in the case, and afterwards ordered that it be referred to the master in equity to inquire and certify what was the market value at the pit's mouth of all the coal worked and gotten by the appellant company from the land of the respondents, being a portion of their land known as Watt's Grant, and that the respondents should be allowed to rank as creditors of the appel- H land company for such aggregate amount as should be certified by the master in equity.

During the hearings in the courts below the principal defence made by the present appellants to the claim of the present respondents was based upon an alleged chain- I pertous agreement. It was proved that the respondents had on Mar. 25, 1895, made an agreement with a certain company called the Bellambi Coal Co. whereby it was agreed that the respondents should employ the solicitor of the Bellambi Coal Co. to conduct proceedings for the purpose of recovering damages from the appellant company, and that in consideration of the respondents paying to the Bellambi Coal Co. 92½ per cent. of the amount recovered that company would indemnify the respondents from all costs and expenses incurred by the taking of the proceedings. It was also found that by an indenture of May 15, 1893, the respondents had leased to the Bellambi Coal Co. the land and the coal under it, which had been entered upon and taken by the appellants, so that by their wrongful acts the Bellambi Co. had been deprived of coal which was believed by them and the respondents to be the subject of their lease. The chief judge held that the agreement of Mar. 25, 1895, was champertous in its character, but that its existence did not preclude the respondents from enforcing their rights against the appellants. The full court overruled the judgment of the chief judge so far as it determined the agreement to be champertous, but agreed with him in holding that, if champertous, it would not preclude the respondents from enforcing their rights against the appellants. In his argument before the committee the leading counsel for the appellants intimated that he felt that he could not rely upon this defence of champerty, and virtually withdrew it. Their Lordships are, therefore, relieved from delivering any judgment upon the subject beyond saying that they see no ground for differing from the judgment delivered on this head by the full court.

Among the other grounds of defence put forward in the courts below was the plea of the statute of limitations. This plea was dealt with fully by the chief judge after he had disposed of the question of champerty in a preliminary judgment. It was raised again before the full court, but not much pressed there, and the full court simply adopted the judgment of the chief judge on this point. It formed, however, the principal subject of discussion at their Lordships' Bar, where it was presented by the learned counsel for the appellants in a most elaborate and ingenious argument. The material facts bearing on the defence of the statute appear in the findings of the chief judge, which had the entire concurrence of the full court. They were arrived at after an exhaustive inquiry lasting for eighteen days, during which much oral and documentary evidence was given. The counsel for the appellants endeavoured to some extent to contest these findings, but their arguments not only failed to show that there was manifest error in the findings of facts by the courts below, in which case alone would their Lordships differ from them, but, being called upon by arguments of counsel to consider the correctness of these findings, their Lordships are of opinion that they are in every respect correct.

It appeared that on Feb. 1, 1854, the Crown granted to John Alexander Watt fifty-one acres of land near Bulli Illawarra. By several conveyances the said fifty-one acres of land, known as Watt's Grant, became vested in Henry Osborne, whose personal representatives are the present respondents. Henry Osborne died in 1858. Early in 1873 the appellants, who were working coal in land adjoining Watt's Grant, found that their workings were approaching the boundary between the two properties, and so informed the then trustees of Henry Osborne's will, and entered into negotiations with them for the purpose of obtaining a lease of Watt's Grant. These negotiations fell through, but the appellants, proceeding secretly with their workings, entered upon Watt's claim, and between 1878 and 1880 removed the coal from under some fourteen acres of such land. The trespass was distinctly shown upon the appellants' own working plan. It was committed underground, and committed wilfully. Until the workings by the Bellambi Coal Co., under their lease of May, 1893, brought to light the fact that a trespass had been committed by the appellants, the respondents and their predecessors were ignorant of the appellants' wrongful working, and had no reason to suspect that any had occurred. Upon these facts the courts below have come to the conclusion that no laches can be attributed to the respondents in not discovering the existence of the wrongful workings by the appellants—a conclusion with which their Lordships entirely concur.

Accepting, however, for the purposes of argument the findings of the chief judge, the learned counsel for the appellants contended that the statute of limitations was an answer to the respondents' claim. Their argument was to this effect. Granted, they said, that the trespass was intentional—as indeed most trespasses were—that circumstance of itself was no answer to the plea of the statute. To use the language of ALDERSON, B. (Hunter v. Gibbons (1), 1 H. & N. at p. 465), there was “no distinction between trespasses underground and upon the surface.” It constantly happened, as MARTIN, B., observed in Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. London Gas Light Co. (2) (10 Exch. at p. 42), that the owner of a coal mine takes coal from an adjoining mine and by fraud prevents its being found out for more than six years.

A "Yet that," adds the learned judge, "is no answer to the statute of limitations." Clearly it was no defence at law. Why then should it be a defence when the claim is put forward in a court of equity? The foundation of the claim must be the same wherever the injured party may seek redress. At law he sues for damages in an action of trespass. If he comes into a court of equity still it is in respect of the trespass that he claims compensation. There being, therefore, a concurrent jurisdiction at law and in equity in respect of the very same wrong and the very same cause of action, the statute is as binding in equity as it is at law in accordance with the views expressed by the House of Lords in the well-known case of Knox v. Gye (3) (L.R. 5 H.L. at p. 674). If, indeed, the respondents had been able to make out a case of what PALLES, C.B. (Barber v. Houston (4), 14 L.R.Ir. 273), terms "active or aggressive concealment" that might have been a different matter. Possibly relief might then have been had in accordance with the principles to be deduced from Gibbs v. Guild (5) and similar cases. But nothing of the kind was suggested here. The appellants have taken the respondents' coal. Be it so. They have done nothing more. That is the beginning and the end of their offending. It cannot be said that they have done anything actively to prevent the respondents or their predecessors in title finding out what they did.

D Such was the contention of the appellants' counsel, but their Lordships are unable to accede to it. It seems to ignore the nature and character of the act of which the respondents complain, and to disregard the principles on which courts of equity proceed in dealing with fraud. It will not be out of place to cite a passage from the judgment of LORD HATHERLEY in Livingstone v. Rauryards Coal Co. (6), before the House of Lords. The House was there dealing only with the measure of damage in a case of underground trespass. But in pointing out the distinction between a case of fraud and a case of inadvertence LORD HATHERLEY uses very plain language, and his remarks may be useful in clearing the ground. He said (5 App. Cas. at p. 34):

F "There is no doubt that if a man furtively and in bad faith robs his neighbour of property, and because it is underground is probably not for some time detected, the court of equity in this country will struggle, or I should rather say will assert its authority, to punish fraud, by fixing the person with the value of the whole of the property which he has so furtively taken and making him no allowance in respect of what he has so done as would have been justly made to him if the parties had been working by agreement, or if as in the present case they had been the one working and the other permitting the working through a mistake. The courts have already made a wide distinction between that which is done by the common error of both parties and that which is done by fraud."

I In the present case the coal was taken furtively. No one can deny that it is a fraud to rob your neighbour furtively of his property or that a court of equity ought to give redress for such a wrong. As LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., presiding in a court of equity observed (Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen (7), 2 Ves. Sen. at p. 155):

"This court has an undoubted jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud."

I Where the remedy is given on the ground of fraud LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Rolfe v. Gregory (8), pointed out (4 De G.J. & Sm. at p. 579) that "it is governed by this important principle, that the right of the party defrauded is not affected by the lapse of time or, generally speaking, by anything done or omitted to be done so long as he remains without any fault of his own in ignorance of the fraud which has been committed."

The statute of limitations has really no application to a case such as this. Courts of equity are not within the words of the statute, which only apply to certain legal remedies, though they are, as it has been said, within its spirit and meaning. The way in which the statute came to be applied in proceedings in equity is explained by LORD CAMDEN, L.C., in his judgment in Smith v. Clay (9), which was published from his Lordship's own notes. He says (3 Bro. C.C. at p. 639, n.) :

"A court of equity which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience has always refused its aid to stale demands."

As, however, it had no legislative authority, it could not define exactly the time of bar. It was governed by circumstances. But as often as Parliament prescribed a limit to proceedings at law the Court of Chancery adopted that rule and applied it to similar cases in equity. He adds :

"For when the legislature had fixed the time at law, it would have been preposterous for equity, which by its own proper authority always maintained a limitation, to countenance laches beyond the period that law had been confined to by Parliament."

It has always been a principle of equity that no length of time is a bar to relief in the case of fraud in the absence of laches on the part of the person defrauded. There is, therefore, no room for the application of the statute in the case of concealed fraud so long as the party defrauded remains in ignorance without any fault of his own. The contention on behalf of the appellants that the statute is a bar unless the wrongdoer is proved to have taken active measures in order to prevent detection is opposed to common sense as well as to the principles of equity. Two men acting independently steal a neighbour's coal. One is so clumsy in his operations or so incautious that he has to do something more in order to conceal his fraud. The other chooses his opportunity so wisely and acts so warily that he can safely calculate on not being found out for many a long day. Why is the one to go scot free at the end of a limited period rather than the other? It would be something of a mockery for courts of equity to denounce fraud as "a secret thing," and to profess to punish it sooner or later, and then to hold out a reward for the cunning that makes detection difficult or remote.

There is very little direct authority on the particular point which was urged with so much ingenuity at the Bar. Indeed Ecclesiastical Comrs. for England v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (10), before MALINS, V.-C., was cited as the only reported case in which the account was carried back beyond the period prescribed as a bar by the statute of limitations, and their Lordships are compelled to say that they are unable to rely on the decision in that case. It is very difficult to follow the reasoning of the learned Vice-Chancellor. His Honour said distinctly "there was no improper intention." He held that what was done "was done under a mistake." Yet the defendants were visited with all the pains and penalties of fraud. The account was carried back beyond the six years; the measure of damages was in accordance with the severest rule ever applied. The ground of the decision seems to have been that, although there was no moral fraud—no fraud in fact—yet "for the purposes of the statute the breaking of bounds into a neighbour's colliery must be considered a fraudulent act." There is no foundation for that proposition. Underground trespass may be committed in good faith without any sinister intention, or it may be committed under circumstances which would render the wrongdoer liable to a prosecution for felony. Every case must depend upon its own circumstances. There is nothing in principle, or in authority, or in the exigencies of public policy, to require that the same measure of justice or injustice should be meted out to all transgressors alike, ignorant or wilful, innocent or fraudulent.

In all or almost all the other cases cited at the Bar the court held that fraud was not established. But SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in Dean v. Thwaite (11) and FRY, J., in Trotter v. Maclean (12), expressed their opinion that fraud would or might be an answer to the plea of the statute. In Dean v. Thwaite (11), where the learned

A Master of the Rolls held that the evidence of fraud was not conclusive. His Honour made these observations (21 Beav. at p. 623) :

B “The case of fraud alleged, and the only fraud that I think would justify the court in coming to a conclusion that the coal gotten before [the period of limitation] ought to be accounted for, is that the defendant had intentionally taken the plaintiffs’ coal and had concealed the fact, and during the process had taken steps to prevent the plaintiffs discovering it.”

C If those observations are to be construed to mean that in the learned judge’s opinion something more was required beyond taking the coal furtively, their Lordships are unable to agree in them. But they think that is not the fair meaning of the passage cited, which must be understood as applied to the alleged facts of the case on which the learned judge was then commenting. In Trotter v. Maclean (12), FRY, J., remarks that the period of limitation imposed by the Limitation Act, 1623, ought to apply to proceedings in the Chancery Division in respect of a trespass, unless there was some equitable ground for repelling the application of the statute. He adds (13 Ch.D. at p. 584) :

D “Such an equitable ground has in many cases been found in fraud. When fraud or any other equitable circumstance exists, undoubtedly the statute will not apply.”

E It may be observed that in Trotter v. Maclean (12) no fraud was suggested beyond the fraud that lies in the secrecy of wilful trespass underground, and that the plaintiffs failed to prove in that case that the trespass was wilful.

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that the statute of limitations cannot be set up as a bar in the present case, and they think that this conclusion is not opposed to any authority.

R. v. SENIOR

H [COURT FOR CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Wills, Day, Grantham, Lawrance and Wright, J.J.), December 10, 1898]

I Criminal Law—Manslaughter—Neglect—Child—“Wilful neglect”—Failure to provide medical attendance—Failure due to religious belief.

By s. 1 of the Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 [see now Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (12 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 974), s. 1 (1)], it was provided that any person over 16 years of age who, having the custody, charge, or care of any child under 16 years of age, “wilfully neglected” such child in a manner likely to cause injury to the health of such child should be guilty of a misdemeanour.

The prisoner, father of a child of eight or nine months who was suffering from pneumonia, failed to procure for the child any medical aid or medicine, his reason for failing to do so being that he belonged to a religious sect the members of which believed that sickness should be treated with prayer and that treatment by doctors and drugs was sinful. The prisoner was generally a good and kind father and a man of excellent character. The child having died, the prisoner was charged with manslaughter and convicted.

Held: "wilful" in the phrase "wilful neglect" meant done deliberately and not by inadvertence, "neglect" was the omission to do something for the benefit of the child, and so the phrase as a whole meant intentional failure to take those steps which the experience of mankind showed to be generally necessary; the prisoner had been guilty of such a failure and so was in breach of s. 1 of the Act of 1894; the fact that he was in general an affectionate parent and had acted as he did from religious motives did not avail him; and, therefore, he had been rightly convicted of manslaughter.

Per CURIAM: He could also have been convicted on an indictment for gross and culpable neglect of the child at common law.

Case Stated by WILLS, J.

The prisoner was indicted and tried before WILLS, J., at the Central Criminal Court on Nov. 24, 1898, for the manslaughter of his child, an infant of the age of eight or nine months. The child had died of diarrhoea and pneumonia. The prisoner had not supplied it with any medical aid or medicine, though aware that the case was of great gravity and that the child would probably die. The medical evidence was that the child's life would certainly have been prolonged and in all probability saved if medical assistance had been procured. No question was raised as to the prisoner's ability to procure and pay for medical assistance. He was shown to have been a good and kind father in all other respects, and he bore an excellent character for general good conduct. He had had twelve children, of whom seven were dead, and he had previously had experiences of the same kind as those relating to the present inquiry. The prisoner was a member of a sect called the "Peculiar People," who based their religious doctrines as to the treatment of sick people on the Epistle of James, c. 5, verses 14 and 15:

"Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

They did not allege that medical aid was there expressly forbidden, but said that to make use of it was to indicate a want of faith in the Lord.

The learned judge inquired if they held that any other parts of the Scriptures, the Gospels for instance, were of Divine authority, and was answered that the Gospels certainly were so recognised. He called attention to the fact that our Lord said "they that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," and asked why they thought that it could be wrong to consult a physician if the sick man was pronounced on such authority to need a physician. The answer was that the sickness here alluded to was moral sickness or sin, and that the physician meant our Lord himself. The judge inquired further if they held that it was wrong to give extra food or wine or brandy to a sick person, or to put an extra blanket on his bed if the weather were cold or the nature of his sickness required him to be kept warm. The answer was, No, that they gave the sick every species of comfort, and it appeared that this child had had much attention paid to its food and diet, though the medical witnesses did not think the dietary altogether judicious, and that it had had brandy administered. They told the judge that they did not object to experienced nursing and that they resorted to it, and did so in the case of this child, but that the nursing must be by one of their own people, who would not use drugs. It thus appeared distinctly that they did not object to the use of many human appliances and efforts to save the sick, but that they drew the line at doctors and drugs, and, his Lordship thought, at doctors, not on account of their superior knowledge of the human frame and its needs, as because they were likely to use or prescribe drugs.

WILLS, J., told the jury that they must first of all be satisfied that the death of the child had been caused or accelerated by the want of medical assistance; secondly, that medical aid and medicine were such essential things for the child that reasonably careful parents in general would have provided them; and, thirdly, that the prisoner's means would have enabled him to do so without an expenditure such as could not be reasonably expected from him. He then directed them that in order to make out a case of manslaughter by negligence of this kind purely at common law the negligence must be gross and wanton, so much so as to indicate something at all events of an evil mind, and that it was impossible to say that of the prisoner, who was shown to have spared neither expense nor care, and to have taken in all respects but one every precaution to do the best for the child. But, if he had done anything which was expressly forbidden by statute, and by so doing had caused or accelerated the child's death, he would be guilty of manslaughter, no matter what his motive or state of mind. He drew the attention of the jury to s. 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, which provided that any person over sixteen years of age who, having the custody, charge, or care, of any child under sixteen years of age, wilfully illtreated, neglected, abandoned, or exposed such child in a manner likely to cause injury to the health of such child should be guilty of a misdemeanour [see now Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 1 (1)], and that, therefore, if the prisoner had brought himself within that statute, and the child had died in consequence, he would have caused the death of the child by a course of conduct forbidden by statute, and, therefore, unlawful, and would be guilty of manslaughter.

The learned judge further said there could be no doubt that the prisoner had wilfully and deliberately abstained from calling in medical assistance, though he and those about the child were aware for some considerable period before its death that it was in a state of great danger, and that, therefore, the question was narrowed down to whether his failure to procure medical aid could be called neglecting the child so as to cause some serious injury to its health. He said that "neglect" was not a word of art, but a word of ordinary English; that the standard of neglect varied as time went on, and that many things might be legitimately looked upon as evidences of neglect in one generation which would not have been thought so in a preceding generation, and regard must be had to the habits and thoughts of the day.

It was for the jury to say whether any particular state of things which might be established came up to the description of "neglecting"—not do a specific thing, as to supply medicine, in which case it would mean very little more than omitting or failing to do it—but to "neglecting a child," which was a very different thing, always bearing in mind that it must be to such a degree and in such a manner as to endanger its health.

The jury found the prisoner Guilty, adding that they considered medical aid and medicine to have been necessary for the child, but that they were of opinion that the prisoner had done all that he could in the best interests of the child except in not providing medical aid and medicine. The questions for the opinion of the court were whether the learned judges direction was right in law, and, if so, whether there was evidence upon which the jury could properly convict the prisoner. If both the questions were answered in the affirmative the conviction was to stand; if either A was answered in the negative the conviction was to be quashed.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case we have to deal with a B Case stated by my brother WILLS, on the trial of the defendant on a charge framed with reference to the Cruelty to Children Act, 1894.

The first question we have to consider is whether the learned judge was right in his direction to the jury as to what constitutes wilful neglect; and the second question is whether there was evidence on which the jury could convict the defendant of wilful neglect. The charge is preferred under s. 1 of the Act, which provides C that if any person who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of sixteen "wilfully neglects" such child, that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. It is useful to refer to the history of legislation on the subject. By s. 37 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, a statute dealing with the relief of the poor, it was enacted that any parent who wilfully neglected to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for his child being in his custody under the age of D fourteen years, whereby the health of such child was seriously injured, was guilty of an offence. Therefore it became under that statute the duty of a parent to provide medical aid for his children. That statute was followed by a statute of 1889 with which it is not necessary to deal. It is important to remember that the statute of 1868 was passed after the judgment of WILLES, J., in R. v. Wagstaff (1), WILLES, J., having given judgment in January while the statute is dated August. I

We now come to the statute of 1894, and there is a great difference in the wording of the Act, for "medical aid" is dropped. It is difficult to believe that the legislature was taking a retrograde step, for the statute shows that it was passed in consequence of increased anxiety for the welfare of children. In the case we are now considering it is not disputed that the child was in a dangerous state to the knowledge of the parent. It is not disputed, and the jury have found that its life would have been saved if medical assistance had been given, and that the parent was in a position to provide medical aid. Further, that the parent did not give medical aid, and that he did not because he believed to do so would be a want of faith in the methods which he believed to be prescribed by the Bible, and that he was otherwise an attentive parent. Lastly, that the child died. These being the facts, the learned judge charged the jury as follows :

"I told the jury that they must first of all be satisfied that the death of the child had been caused or accelerated by the want of medical assistance. Secondly, that medical aid and medicine were such essential things for the child that reasonably careful parents in general would have provided them; and, thirdly, that the prisoner's means would have enabled him to do so without an expenditure as could not be reasonably expected from him."

Was that direction substantially right? I think it was. It seems to me to be the same, whether you take the words separately or conjoined. The words are, if a person "wilfully neglects." It seems to me very clear what this phrase means; "wilfully" means done deliberately and not by inadvertence, and "neglect" the omission to do something for the benefit of the child—in other words, intentional failure to take those steps which the experience of mankind shows to be generally necessary. In these days the resources of medical science are within the reach of the humblest and the poorest. The learned counsel has argued with his invariable clearness that, because the father was an affectionate parent and because he neglected to provide nothing for the child except that which its condition urgently required, that it was impossible to say that he was guilty of wilful neglect. When a child breaks its thighbone and an operation is necessary, which is in the highest

A degree dangerous while the child is in a state of consciousness, would the father be guilty of neglect if he refused to permit the administration of an anæsthetic drug? What if the child in an infantile complaint is in danger of suffocation, and it is necessary to perform a tracheotomy, would it be wilful neglect to refuse to permit the use of an anæsthetic? I think that in either of these cases the parent would properly be convicted. I dissent entirely from the view said to have been expressed by PIGGOTT, B., in R. v. Hines (2), and I think that in this case an indictment for gross and culpable neglect could be supported at common law.

WILLS, J.—This is a case of a class which so frequently comes before the judges that I thought it well to state the Case in order that an authoritative decision might be delivered on the point.

HORSEY ESTATE, LTD. v. STEIGER AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., A. L. Smith and Henn Collins, L.JJ.), May 15, 1899]

47 W.R. 644; 15 T.L.R. 367]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Liquidation of company—Liquidation for reconstruction of company, not because of insolvency—Condition running with the land.

By a lease to J. D. and a limited company the lessees (a term which by the lease included assigns where the context so required or admitted) covenanted not to assign or underlet the premises without first obtaining the consent of the lessors, and the lease contained a proviso for re-entry if the lessees should at any time fail to perform any of their covenants, "or if they shall become bankrupt or enter into liquidation for the benefit of or compound with their creditors, or, being a company, shall enter into liquidation whether compulsory or voluntary." With the lessors' consent the lease was assigned to J. S. and a different limited company, the defendants in this action. In December, 1896, the defendant company, for the purpose merely of reconstruction with increased capital, passed a resolution for voluntary winding-up. In December, 1897, the defendants entered into an agreement for the sale by them to a new company of all their interest in the lease, and under that agreement the new company entered into possession of the premises. The lessors served a notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 14, on both tenants alleging a forfeiture in consequence of the company's liquidation and breach of the covenant and brought an action to recover possession of the premises.

Held: (i) on the true construction of the proviso "liquidation" meant liquidation in fact and not only liquidation in consequence of insolvency, the cause which led to the liquidation, or its object, being wholly immaterial, and, therefore, the proviso was applicable; (ii) the condition contained in the proviso ran with the land and so was capable of being effective against the defendants as assignees; but (iii) in view of its terms and the circumstances the notice given in purported compliance with s. 14 of the Act of 1881 was not a good notice, and the action failed.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant not to sub-let without consent—Sale of interest in lease by one company to new company—Entry into possession of premises by new company.

Per CURIAM: The circumstances in which, in December, 1897, the new company entered into possession of the premises did not constitute an "under-letting" of the premises within the covenant; the new company had been let in on terms of purchase.

Notes. The relevant provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, were repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 427), and replaced by s. 146 of that Act.

B Appeal from a decision of HAWKINS, J., in an action, tried by him, without a jury, in which the plaintiff company, owners of a piece of land at Blackwall, sought against their tenants to recover possession of the demised premises under a proviso for re-entry contained in the lease: see [1898] 2 Q.B. 259.

C On Nov. 4, 1889, the trustees of the will of Thomas Horsey, deceased, demised the land to John Donelly and the Patent Stamped Steel Railway Axle Box Co., Ltd., for the term of twenty-one years from Michaelmas, 1889, at the rent mentioned in the deed. The lease provided that the expression "lessees," where used in the lease, should "include the executors, administrators, and assigns of the said John Donelly and the successors and assigns of the said company, where the context so requires and admits."

D The lessees for themselves and their assigns, and as a separate covenant each of them for himself and itself respectively and his and its respective assigns, covenanted to pay the rent, to repair all buildings which thereunto might during the term be erected on the demised ground, and, further,

E "that the lessees will not at any time or times during the said term assign or underlet the said premises or any part thereof to any person or persons whomsoever without first obtaining the consent of the lessors in writing for that purpose, but it is hereby agreed that such consent shall not be unreasonably or vexatiously withheld in the case of the lessees satisfying the lessors that the proposed assignee or under-lessee is a substantial, respectable, and responsible person."

F There was also a proviso for re-entry if the rent, or any part thereof, should be in arrear for twenty-one days, or if the lessees should at any time fail or neglect to observe or perform any of their covenants, or

G "if the lessees shall become bankrupt or enter into liquidation for the benefit of or compound with their creditors, or, being a company, shall enter into liquidation whether compulsory or voluntary."

On Aug. 1, 1894, the lessors conveyed all their interest in the premises to the plaintiffs. On Dec. 14, 1895, the lessees, with the written consent of the lessors, assigned the residue of the term to the defendants. The written consent of the lessors provided that

H "this consent shall not authorise any further or other assignment or demise of the said premises, or any part thereof, or prejudice or affect any of the covenants, conditions, or provisions in the said indenture of lease contained, except to the extent hereby expressed."

I On Dec. 28, 1896, the shareholders in the defendant company, being desirous of increasing the capital of the company and enlarging its scope, passed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up of the company. On Jan. 26, 1897, this resolution was duly confirmed, and a liquidator was appointed to carry it out. On Sept. 27, 1897, a new company was registered under the same name. On Oct. 30, 1897, a notice of the alleged breach of covenant was served by the plaintiffs upon the original lessees and on the defendant Steiger, under the provisions of s. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. On Nov. 2, 1897, a similar notice was served on the defendant company.

This notice stated that a forfeiture of the lease had occurred because the defendant company had entered into liquidation. On Nov. 4, 1897, this action was commenced.

On Dec. 2, 1897, an agreement was made between the two defendants and the new company for the sale by the defendants to the new company of all their interest in the lease. Under this agreement the new company entered into possession of the premises, though no assignment was in fact executed, nor was any application made to the plaintiffs for their consent to such assignment. To save expense the parties to the action agreed that any new forfeiture which might have been caused by this arrangement should be treated as having occurred before the action had been commenced. At the trial of the action HAWKINS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that the defendant company had entered into liquidation within the meaning of the proviso for re-entry contained in the lease. The defendants appealed.

May 15, 1899. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—The question is whether the plaintiff company has established the right to re-enter upon the demised premises upon either of the grounds of forfeiture alleged, viz., (a) that the defendant company has entered into liquidation; or (b) that the defendants have underlet the demised premises.

First, as to the liquidation. That the defendant company has entered into liquidation is not denied, but it was argued for the company (i) that upon the true construction of the lease the liquidation, within the meaning of the condition or proviso in the lease, must be a liquidation brought about by, or in consequence of, insolvency, which (it was admitted) was not the case here; (ii) that the proviso in the lease only applied in case the individual lessee was bankrupt or had liquidated with his creditors and the company had entered into liquidation in consequence of insolvency; (iii) that, if these contentions failed, the proviso or condition in question did not run with the land so as to bind the defendants, who were assigns of the original lessee; (iv) that due notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 14, had not been given before action, and that this was a condition precedent to the right to maintain any action; and, lastly, (v) that the defendants were, all these contentions failing, entitled to apply to the court for relief.

I propose to consider these points seriatim. As to the first point, in my judgment the determining event is the entering into liquidation in fact, and the cause which led to that event, or its object, is wholly immaterial. The contention of the defendants involves the introduction into the proviso after the word "voluntary" of the words "in consequence of insolvency." It seems to me the condition or proviso must be construed according to its plain meaning and without this qualification. As to the second point, I think that the condition is carefully framed so as to make the proviso for re-entry apply if either the individual lessee became bankrupt or compounded with his creditors (which is the first clause of the condition) or if the company lessee entered into liquidation.

If, therefore, this were an action against the original lessees, the plaintiff company would, subject to the question of notice, be entitled to re-entry under the condition. But this is an action against the assigns of the original lessees. The third point, which presents the greatest difficulty, has, therefore, to be considered, viz., is this condition of re-entry in the event of the company entering into liquidation one which in the language of the common law "runs with the land"? It is to be noted that this question was not raised in the court below, and the judgment of the learned judge is silent upon it. It was put in argument that the question here turned upon a condition and not upon a covenant, and it was suggested that the cases dealing with covenants were, therefore, not authorities on the present question. I cannot assent to this view. Whether a particular covenant or condition does or does not run with the land is determined by the common law, and it is enough to say that the authorities uniformly treat them as governed by the same principles: Stevens v. Copp (1). Further, the statute 32 Henry 8, c. 34, s. 1 [relating to the grant of reversions: repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, of which see now ss. 141, 142] which gives assignees of the reversion the same benefit and remedies as lessors or grantors in respect of covenants and conditions, couples them together, and s. 2 of that Act, which gives lessees the same remedies against assignees of the reversion which they had against the lessor or grantor, in like manner couples conditions and covenants together.

Is, then, the condition in question one the burden of which runs with the land so that its obligation binds the assignee of the lease? The answer to this question depends, in this case, upon whether it is a condition touching the thing demised or is merely collateral. I say "in this case" because there are undoubtedly collateral covenants or conditions, which on equitable principles, but only in a restrictive sense, bind the assignee. But this principle is confined to covenants and conditions of a negative character, and depends upon notice. Apart from cases of this class the true principle is that no covenant or condition which affects merely the person and does not affect the nature, quality, or value of the thing demised or the mode of using or enjoying the thing demised, runs with the land: see Congleton Corpn. v. Pattison (2).

Does then the condition or proviso in question "run with the land"? On the whole, and after much hesitation, I have arrived at the conclusion that it does. It must be taken as fully established that a covenant against assignment and also a proviso for re-entry in the case of bankruptcy runs with the land: see Doe d. Dingley v. Sales (3); Doe d. Bridgman v. David (4); Doe d. Lloyd v. Ingleby (5); Williams v. Earle (6); Varley v. Coppard (7); Smith v. Gronow (8). I think that a proviso for re-entry in case of liquidation by a company or an individual falls within the principle of these cases, and indeed that the proviso as to liquidation is cognate both to a covenant against assignment and to a proviso relating to bankruptcy; it partakes of the character of each of them. The proviso against bankruptcy was introduced into leases in consequence of the ordinary covenant against assignment being held not to apply to the involuntary assignment which is the consequence of bankruptcy: see Doe d. Lloyd v. Ingleby (5); and, like the covenant against assignment, it touches the question who shall have and occupy the premises demised, and, therefore, touches and concerns the thing demised: see Williams v. Earle (6), per BLACKBURN, J. I find myself unable to draw any distinction in principle between these cases and the case of a proviso for re-entry in case the assign of the lessee should enter into liquidation.

I think the result, that covenants against assignment and provisos for re-entry in the event of bankruptcy or liquidation stand on the same footing, is made clearer by considering what are the consequences following from a company entering into liquidation. By s. 129 of the Companies Act, 1862, the company may be wound-up, as in this case, by a special resolution, and by s. 130 the winding-up is deemed to commence when the resolution is passed. By s. 131, the special resolution having been passed, the company ceases to carry on its business except as far as may be required for its beneficial winding-up; it is moribund, if not dead. By s. 133 its property, after payment of creditors, must be distributed among its members, and by sub-s. (7) of s. 133 the liquidator may, without its being necessary to obtain any sanction from the court, exercise all the powers of the official liquidator, and among these powers is that given by s. 95, enabling the liquidator to sell the real or other property to any person or company or to sell the same in parcels [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 278 et seq.]. In the present case, the original and confirmatory resolutions for winding-up having been passed, it cannot be contested that liquidation has in fact been entered upon; and, although it is true that the winding-up has not been completed within the meaning of ss. 142 and 143, I see no power in the company to undo what it has done. The winding-up must go through, and must involve the dealing with the property of the company, including their interest in the premises in question in the manner provided in the foregoing sections. I arrive, therefore, at the conclusion that the proviso for re-entry in case of the assigns of the original lessee entering upon liquidation applies, and that unless there is some other answer the plaintiff can insist on re-entering.

I have now to consider the remaining, the fourth, point—viz., that no proper notice was given under s. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Was any such notice necessary? The answer to that question depends upon two considerations: (i) Is the liquidation in this case equivalent to a bankruptcy within sub-s. (6) of s. 14 [now s. 146 (1) of Law of Property Act, 1925] and, if so, (ii) what is the effect of sub-s. (2) of s. 2 of the amending Act of 1892 [s. 146 (10) of Act of 1925]? As to the first, I think, looking to the wide words of the interpretation section, s. 2, of the Act of 1881 [s. 205 (1) (i) of Act of 1925] referring to bankruptcy, that liquidation is within the meaning of bankruptcy as interpreted by sub-s. (6) of s. 14 of the Act of 1881. It follows that, if the Act of 1892 has not effected a difference, the plaintiff company was not bound, as to this ground of forfeiture, to give notice at all. Has, then, the Act of 1892 made any difference? I think it has. I think the effect of s. 2 (2) of that Act, which is very difficult of construction, is to take the case of forfeiture for bankruptcy or liquidation out of the cases in which notice is not necessary for one year from the bankruptcy or liquidation.

If, then, notice is necessary, has it been given? To determine the character of the required notice, what it shall contain and when it ought to be given, it is necessary to consider the scope of s. 14 of the Act of 1881 as a whole. The object seems to be to require in the defined cases (i) that a notice shall precede any proceeding to enforce a forfeiture; (ii) that the notice shall be such as to give the tenant precise information of what is alleged against him and what is demanded from him; and (iii) that a reasonable time shall after notice be allowed the tenant to act before any action is brought. The reason is clear. He ought to have the opportunity of considering whether he can admit the breach alleged, whether it is capable of remedy, whether he ought to offer any, and, if so, what compensation, and, finally, if the case is one for relief, whether he ought or ought not promptly to apply for such relief. In short, the notice is intended to give to the person whose interest it is sought to forfeit the opportunity of considering his position before an action is brought against him. The notice in question is dated Oct. 29, 1897, and alleges that the defendants, the company, had entered into liquidation, and, further, that they had broken the covenant to repair. [The latter allegation was abandoned.] It then proceeds to demand compensation, and gives notice that, if the defendants fail to remedy the breaches within a reasonable time, the plaintiffs will re-enter. To the notice is annexed a schedule requiring very extensive repairs to be done, which would require a considerable time to accomplish. This notice was served on Nov. 2, and the writ in the action was served on Nov. 4. It is now admitted that the plaintiffs were not in a position to rely upon the alleged breach for non-repair.

In these circumstances can this be said to be a proper notice within the Act? On the whole, I think not. In the first place, if the entering upon liquidation had alone been put forward, the defendants would have had the opportunity of considering whether they had any answer, and, if not, whether they could make terms with the plaintiffs, but this was impracticable so long as the claim for breach of covenant to repair was made. Again, if non-repair was alone relied on, the defendants might possibly, by offer of compensation accompanied by undertaking to repair, have made terms with the plaintiffs. Further, the statute clearly contemplates that a reasonable interval shall elapse after service of notice and before action. Can two days' notice be said, in all the circumstances, to be a reasonable notice? I think not. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the notice was bad and did not comply with the condition precedent to action within s. 14 of the Act of 1881.

In the view which I have expressed it becomes unnecessary to discuss whether the plaintiff company has established a right to re-enter on the ground that the

A defendants have underlet; but as it has been discussed in argument, it may perhaps be better to notice it. It is admitted that there has been no assignment within the meaning of the covenant against assignment. What has taken place is this. The defendants, having agreed to sell to the new company, have let them into possession pending the completion of the purchase, the new company undertaking to pay all rents, rates, and outgoings in connection with the premises or the business there carried on. There is a provision for redelivery of possession to the defendants if the contract should be rescinded. It is contended that this makes the new company the defendants' under-tenants. But on what terms? The new company pay no rent to the defendants; they have undertaken no obligation to the defendants except those mentioned, which are not necessarily obligations of tenancy. But it is said the proper inference from these facts is that a tenancy at will has been created. Whether this may be technically so or not, the practical answer to this contention seems to be that the defendants could not by the exercise of their will turn the new company out. The effective answer of the new company would be: We have come in as purchasers and we are willing to carry out our terms of purchase. In plain sense and according to the ordinary understanding of men, this is not a case of underletting at all, but merely a case in which the new company has been let in on terms of purchase. Had the covenant been (as is of late years often the case) against parting with possession without licence of the landlord, the plaintiff company would have proved a breach of such a covenant, but they have not established a breach of the covenant in question, which is against underletting only. My learned brethren agree with this judgment. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed with costs.

In order to justify the court in exercising its summary power to commit for contempt a person who has published matter referring to a charge pending against some other person, the matter published must have been intended or clearly calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the charge and so interfere with the administration of justice. It is an arbitrary power, and so should be used only in cases where the needs of justice call for its exercise.

Rule Nisi calling on the respondents, Payne and Cooper, to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue against them for contempt of court in publishing matter calculated to interfere with the fair trial of the applicant on a charge upon which he had been committed by the justices for trial at the approaching assizes.

The applicant was the secretary of a limited company in Huntingdonshire which owned a newspaper called the "Huntingdonshire Post." Early in November, 1885, the applicant was arrested on a charge of attempting to commit arson on the premises of the newspaper. While the charge was still pending the directors of the company noticed in another newspaper an advertisement to the effect that the sheriff of the county was about to sell the "Huntingdonshire Post." As the directors knew nothing of the circumstances which led up to this advertisement they made inquiries. The result of these was, in their opinion, to show that the applicant had been guilty of misconduct in his post of secretary to the company. To explain to the readers of the newspaper how matters stood, Payne, one of the directors, wrote and published an article in the issue of Nov. 30, 1895, recounting the investigations that had taken place, and denouncing the conduct of the applicant. In due course the charge of attempted arson against the applicant was dismissed by the magistrates, and he was then prosecuted on charges arising out of his conduct as secretary of the company. While these charges were pending, Cooper—who up till this time was not connected with the "Huntingdonshire Post"—bought the paper, and on Feb. 15, 1896, he published an article in it explaining the circumstances under which he bought it, and referring therein to the previous article upon the applicant's conduct. On Mar. 7, 1896, a meeting of the joint committee of the county council and the magistrates was held, at which there was a discussion which was open to the public, whether the county should pay for legal help for the police in the prosecution. In this discussion Cooper took part, and afterwards a verbatim report of it was published in the "Huntingdonshire Post." A somewhat reduced report appeared in the other local newspapers. At this time the applicant had been returned for trial. On Mar. 25, 1896, the applicant obtained a rule nisi, which now came on for hearing.

Shearman, for Payne, and Dickens, Q.C., and Brooke Little, for Cooper, showed cause against the rule.

LORD RUSSELL, C.J.—A rule has been obtained calling on Payne and Cooper to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue against them for contempt. In my opinion, the application is unfounded, and the rule must be discharged. I want to take this opportunity of expressing a further opinion, and that is that applications such as this—applications to the court to exercise its summary power to commit for contempt—have of late been far too numerous. That this summary power is most salutary no one can doubt, and it is a power which the court will not hesitate to use where there is any attempt to interfere with the administration of justice. But it is an arbitrary power, and, therefore, it ought to be used only in cases where the needs of justice call for its exercise. The learned counsel seems to think that every libel upon a person under trial is a contempt, but this is not necessarily so. To justify the exercise of this summary power something must have been published which was intended or clearly calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the charge or action. The facts in this case support no such suggestions.

In some cases, more especially in the Chancery courts, the decisions of the courts have gone, in my opinion, too far. The true rule to be observed in dealing with these applications is that laid down by COTTON, L.J., in Re O'Malley, Hunt v. Clarke (1). He there says (61 L.T. at p. 344):

"If a thing is done wilfully which really will prejudice the parties to the cause before it comes on, I should not hesitate to commit to prison anyone who so offended. But of course that jurisdiction is one which is only to be exercised by the court in extreme cases, and it would be most unfortunate if this court, or any court, readily took upon itself to interfere in such a summary way, and in such an extraordinary way, unless there were really something which required the interference of the court in that way in order to ensure the due conduct of business."

Farther on COTTON, L.J., cites with approval the language used by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Costa Rica Republic v. Erlanger (2) (36 L.T. at p. 333). That language is:

"Therefore, it seems to me that this jurisdiction of committing for contempt being practically arbitrary and unlimited, should be most zealously and carefully watched, and exercised if I may say so, with the greatest reluctance and the greatest anxiety on the part of the judges to see whether there is no other mode which is not open to the objection of arbitrariness, and which can be brought to bear upon the subject. I say that a judge should be most careful to see that the cause cannot be fairly prosecuted to a hearing unless this extreme mode of dealing with persons brought before him on accusations of contempt should be adopted. I have myself had on many occasions to consider this jurisdiction, and I have always thought that, necessary though it be, it is necessary only in the sense in which extreme measures are sometimes necessary to preserve men's rights, that is, if no other pertinent remedy can be found."

This case, in my opinion, puts the law as to committals for contempt upon its proper basis. I adopted the judgment of COTTON, L.J., and that of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., therein referred to, as my judgment in this case. The rule must be discharged.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree entirely in what the Lord Chief Justice has said. As is pointed out by COTTON, L.J., in Re O'Malley, Hunt v. Clarke (1), in all cases of this kind there are two questions involved. The first is: Is the publication of such a nature as to be calculated to interfere with a fair trial? If it is not so calculated, we have nothing to do with it. But even if it is calculated to interfere with a fair trial there is a second question. Is it a proper case for such an application? The rule laid down in Re O'Malley, Hunt v. Clarke (1) for answering this is that such an application should not be made except in serious cases. Re O'Malley, Hunt v. Clarke (1) does not appear in the LAW REPORTS, and so possibly some of the cases cited before us today may have been decided without its being taken into consideration by the court.

NOBEL'S EXPLOSIVES CO. v. JENKINS & CO.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Mathew, J.), July, 10, 13, 14, 1896]

12 T.L.R. 522; 8 Asp.M.L.C. 181; 1 Com. Cas. 346]

Shipping—Bill of lading—Exception—Restraint of princes—Cargo of explosives—Fear of seizure by foreign belligerents—Power of master to land goods at "nearest safe and convenient port" if normal port considered unsafe—Duty of master.

Under a bill of lading the plaintiffs shipped on board the defendants' steamer a quantity of explosives to be carried from London to Yokohama, and to be delivered at Yokohama, or "so near thereto as the vessel may safely get." The bill of lading contained the usual exception of "restraint of rulers, princes, or people," and a special clause that, "if the entering of or discharging in the port shall be considered by the master unsafe by reason of war or disturbances, the master may land the goods at the nearest safe and convenient port." The vessel, which had other goods on board belonging to other owners, arrived in the course of her voyage at Hong Kong after war had been declared between China and Japan. As she had explosives on board which were admitted to be contraband of war she was compelled to anchor and fly a red flag. There were in the port several Chinese cruisers, and within sight were two Chinese war-vessels, and the master, in the well-founded belief that, if he proceeded with the explosives on board, the vessel would be stopped and the explosives confiscated, landed the explosives at Hong Kong, and proceeded on his voyage to Yokohama. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the expenses of the storage and subsequent forwarding of their goods from Hong Kong to Yokohama:

Held: (i) the well-founded fear that the goods would be seized amounted to a "restraint of princes or rulers" within the meaning of the exception in the bill of lading; (ii) the fear of seizure justified the master in landing the goods at Hong Kong, which, under the circumstances, was the "nearest safe and convenient port" within the meaning of the special clause; (iii) apart from the clauses in the bill of lading the master had a duty to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him and he had carried out that duty in discharging the explosives at Hong Kong; and, therefore, the action failed.

Action in the Commercial List tried by MATHEW, J., and brought by the plaintiffs, manufacturers of dynamite, claiming the sum of £818 3s. for damages for breach of contract in the carriage of goods in the steamship Denbighshire, of which the defendants were owners.

July 14, 1896. MATHEW, J., read the following judgment.—This was an action brought to recover damages for the non-delivery at Yokohama of explosives, admitted to be contraband of war, after war had been declared between China and Japan. The goods were shipped by the defendants' steamer, the Denbighshire, under a bill of lading by which the goods were to be delivered "at Yokohama or so near thereunto as she may safely get." The bill of lading contained the usual exception of "restraint of princes, rulers, or people" and also a special clause to which I will refer presently. A

The steamer arrived in the course of her voyage at Hong Kong, on Aug. 1, 1894, when war had been declared. By the regulations of the port of Hong Kong, the vessel, having explosives on board, was anchored off the government magazine at Hong Kong, and was compelled to fly a red flag. There were in the port numerous revenue cruisers of the Chinese government manned by European officers, and within sight from where she lay were two Chinese war-vessels. Hong Kong is near the naval station of the Southern Chinese Squadron, and there were other war-vessels about the port. B C

The fact that the Denbighshire had explosives on board was generally known, and the captain, in the reasonable and well-founded belief that the vessel, if she sailed with the plaintiffs' goods on board, would be stopped, and the goods confiscated, telegraphed to his owners for orders, and received from them a reply directing him to land the goods. The defendants at once informed the plaintiffs, who protested against the course proposed to be taken, on the ground that the goods were not contraband of war. The goods were discharged and placed in safe custody, the vessel proceeded on her voyage on Aug. 4, and she arrived safely at Yokohama. For the defendants reliance was placed on the terms of the bill of lading that the steamer should proceed to Yokohama, or as near thereto as she could safely get. It was argued that at Hong Kong she was as near as she could safely get to Yokohama within the meaning of the bill of lading; that the contract was not to carry to the nearest place to which the goods could safely get, but to deliver the goods at Yokohama, or as near thereunto as the vessel could safely get. The vessel did get to Yokohama, and the obligation to deliver the goods under the clause in question thereupon became complete. This ground of defence seems to me untenable. D E

The main ground of defence was the exception in the bill of lading, namely, a restraint of princes, rulers, or people. A large body of evidence was laid before me to show that if the vessel sailed with the goods on board she would in all probability be stopped and boarded. It was certain in that case that the goods would have been confiscated, and quite uncertain what course the captors would take with the ship and rest of the cargo. I am satisfied that if the master had continued the voyage with the goods on board he would have acted recklessly and imprudently. F G

It was argued for the plaintiffs that the clause did not apply unless there was a direct and specific action upon the goods by sovereign authority. It was said that fear of seizure, however well founded, was not a restraint; something in the nature of a seizure was necessary. But this argument is disposed of by Geipel v. Smith (1) and Rodoconachi v. Elliott (2). The goods were as effectively stopped at Hong Kong as if there had been an express order from the Chinese government that contraband of war should be landed. The analogy of a restraint by blockage or embargo seems to me sufficiently close. The warships of the Chinese government were in such a position as to render the sailing of the steamer with contraband of war on board a matter of great danger, though she might have got away safely. The restraint was not temporary as was contended by the plaintiffs' counsel. There was no reason to expect that the obstacles in the way of the vessel would have been removed in any reasonable time; and I find that the captain in refusing to carry the goods farther acted reasonably and prudently, and that the delivery of the goods at Yokohama was frustrated by restraint of princes or rulers within the meaning of the exception. H I

There was a further clause in the bill of lading upon which the defendants relied, and which seems to me to afford a further answer to the plaintiffs' claim, which clause is as follows :

A “ If the entering of or discharging in the port of discharge shall be considered by the master to be unsafe by reason of war or disturbances the master may land the goods at the nearest safe and convenient port at the expense and risk of the owners of the goods.”

It was said that this clause was only intended to apply where difficulties arose upon the vessel's arrival at the port of destination. But I see no ground for this narrow construction. The object was to enable the master to guard against obstacles which might prevent his vessel from reaching her destination in due course. There is no reason to suppose that it was intended to limit his discretion to the case where the information reached him on his arrival off the port of destination.

But, apart from the terms of the bill of lading, it seems to me that the conduct of the captain would be justified by reference to the duty imposed upon him to take reasonable care of the goods intrusted to him. Whether he has discharged that duty must depend upon the circumstances of each case, and here, if the goods had been carried forward, there was every reason to believe that the ship and her cargo would be detained, and the goods of the plaintiffs confiscated. In the words of WILLES, J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in Notara v. Henderson (3) (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 237) :

E “A fair allowance ought to be made for the difficulties in which the master may be involved. . . . The place, the season, the extent of the deterioration, the opportunity and means at hand, the interests of other persons concerned in the adventure, whom it might be unfair to delay for the sake of the part of the cargo in peril; in short, all circumstances affecting risk, trouble, delay, and inconvenience must be taken into account.”

I am of opinion that the course taken by the captain in landing the goods and leaving them in safe custody was a proper discharge of his duty. It was said that the master was not an agent for the shippers because they had protested against the discharge of these goods. But even if this information had reached the captain, F it would not have divested him of his original authority and his right to act in any emergency as agent for the owners of ship and the other owners of cargo. I, therefore, give judgment for the defendants with costs.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Vaughan Williams, J.), February 3, 11, 17, 1896]

Estoppel—Estoppel by record—Decision of county court judge that royalties on patents personal earnings of bankrupt—Effect on future payments.

The right to work an invention patented by an undischarged bankrupt was sold by him to a company for £500 and the payment of a royalty of £10 a week. Instalments amounting to £20 became due, and in an interpleader issue between the company and the official receiver the county court judge decided that the £20 amounted to personal earnings of the bankrupt and must be paid by the company to him. Further sums became payable under the agreement, and the official receiver claimed these and any future royalties falling due on the ground that they were after-acquired property and should be available for the benefit of creditors. The bankrupt's solicitor also claimed costs incurred in relation to the patents under a charge given him by the bankrupt on the patents and royalties. The bankrupt contended that the sums payable were in the nature of personal earnings and as such did not pass to the trustees, and that the trustee was estopped by the decision in the interpleader proceedings from asserting the contrary.

Held: the trustee was estopped by the decision of the county court judge from denying that the sums in question, when made, were in the nature of personal earnings, but the bankrupt could only retain £5 a week of this as reasonable maintenance for himself and his family, the residue, after the solicitor's costs of the creation of the fund had been deducted, passing to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Application by the official receiver, as trustee in the bankruptcy of Graydon, for a declaration that certain moneys due and to become due to the bankrupt under an agreement made since the bankruptcy belonged to the trustee.

On Aug. 12, 1892, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt on which he was adjudicated on Aug. 16, 1892. On April 14, 1894, the bankrupt while undischarged entered into an agreement with the Great Wheel Co., by which he gave them the exclusive right to erect and work a great wheel at Earl's Court which he had invented, and for which he had taken out letters patent on Sept. 26, 1893. Under the agreement the bankrupt was to receive a sum of £500 in cash and a royalty of £10 a week so long as the wheel was running. Shortly afterwards the official receiver gave the company notice that he claimed all the bankrupt's interest under the agreement.

In 1895 the great wheel was erected at the Earl's Court Exhibition, and in August there became payable in royalties to the bankrupt from the company a sum of £20, which the official receiver claimed, and which, after the receipt of the notice, the company declined to pay over to the bankrupt. On Oct. 21, 1895, an order was made in the Brompton County Court on an interpleader summons remitted there, to which the official receiver and the company were parties, for the payment of the £20 to the bankrupt by the company, as these royalties were the personal earnings of the bankrupt, and leave to appeal was refused. Further royalties became payable under the agreement, and the official receiver claimed these as well as any further royalties that might become due for the benefit of the creditors. The bankrupt's solicitor also put in a claim for his costs incurred in relation to the patents under a charge given to him in March, 1895, by the bankrupt on the patents and the royalties under them.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883:

"Section 53.—(2.) Where a bankrupt is in the receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid [i.e., the pay or salary of an officer or civil service clerk], or is entitled to any half-pay or pension, or to any compensation granted by the Treasury, the court on the application of the trustee shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the salary, income, half-pay, pension or compensation, or of any part thereof, to the trustee, to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

February 17, 1896. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question in this case is, whether the trustee is entitled to a declaration that certain payments in the nature of royalties for the licence to use a patented article, that is to say, a great wheel for the carriage of passengers erected at the Earl's Court Exhibition, under letters patent taken out by the bankrupt since the making of the receiving order in August, 1892, and payable to the bankrupt under an agreement also made since the date of the receiving order between him and the Great Wheel Co., Ltd., pass to the trustee. The bankrupt says that the trustee is not entitled to this declaration, first, because the sums payable are in the nature of personal earnings and as such do not pass to the trustee; secondly, the bankrupt says that, in prior litigation between him and the trustee, namely, on the trial of an interpleader issue remitted from the High Court to the county court, it was decided that the sums thus payable to the bankrupt were in the nature of personal earnings, and did not pass to the trustee, and that the trustee is estopped by that decision from asserting the contrary.

I will deal first with the point of estoppel. In my judgment, if this question was in issue between the bankrupt and the trustee in the county court, and was decided between the parties, the trustee would be estopped by the decision; but I do not think that it was proved that the point was decided in the county court. The sum of money as to which the interpleader issue was raised was a sum of £20, two early instalments of the sums payable to the bankrupt. It seems to me on the authorities that it is not true to say that no personal earnings of the bankrupt after the bankruptcy pass to his trustee. The authorities are not very clear, but I think that, on the balance of the authorities (see Wadling v. Oliphant (1), and the cases there cited), that it is only personal earnings necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family which do not pass to the trustee. This is in accordance with the principles which underlie s. 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, with regard to appropriation of a portion of salary.

This being so, it seems to me that the county court judge did not decide anything more than that the £20 in question was not more than was necessary for the reasonable maintenance of the bankrupt—that is to say, that, even assuming the county court judge to have decided that the sums payable were in the nature of personal earnings, no estoppel arises as to the question of future earnings necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt. That the decision of the county court judge was given in reference only to the amount in issue seems to me the fair inference from his observations when asked for leave to appeal. I also think that the fair inference from his judgment is that he did decide the sums in question were in the nature of personal earnings, and that the trustee is estopped from denying this to be the nature of the payments when made. I shall not, therefore, go into this question, but merely consider the question of quantum.

I think that £5 a week is a fitting sum for the bankrupt to retain as reasonable maintenance for himself and family. There must, however, be first deducted from the sums payable the amounts due to Mr. Kimber for costs of the creation of the fund. Then will come the bankrupt's £5, and the residue will pass to the trustee.

Re ROUNDWOOD COLLIERY CO., LTD. LEE v. ROUNDWOOD COLLIERY CO., LTD., AND OTHERS

Bill of Sale—Lease—Mining lease—Power to distrain for rent “in or about any of the premises hereby demised or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries.”
Company—Debenture—Floating charge—Distress for rent—Seizure of goods subject to charge—Subsequent order for winding-up—Validity of distress.

By a lease dated Nov. 20, 1891, by which the defendant demised to a company a seam of coal adjoining the mine then being worked by the company, it was provided that the defendant should have power in case of non-payment of the rent to distrain on and sell the goods and chattels of the company “in or about any of the premises hereby demised or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries.” The lease was not registered as a bill of sale under the Bills of Sale Acts.

On Sept. 24 the company resolved to wind-up voluntarily. On Oct. 1 an action was begun by debenture holders having a floating charge on the property of the company. On Oct. 12 the defendant distrained for rent and seized goods and chattels of the company subject to the charge. On Oct. 13 the resolution to wind-up was confirmed and a liquidator was appointed. On Oct. 15 a receiver was appointed in the debenture holders' action and he took possession of the property of the company.

Held: (i) if the provision in the lease was to be regarded as a power of distress for rent, it was not a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; if it was to be regarded as a power of distress for a debt so as to fall within s. 6 of the Act, then, it being a common provision in a mining lease, it fell within the exception "agreement not being a mining lease" in s. 6; therefore, the lease was not a bill of sale which was void for lack of registration;

(ii) the distress, having been made before the commencement of the winding-up on Oct. 13 and before a receiver was appointed, was valid as against the debenture-holders.

Jan. 30, 1897. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of STIRLING, J., restraining a lessor of a seam of coal in Yorkshire from selling under a distress for rent goods of his lessee, but which goods were seized on lands not comprised in the lease. STIRLING, J., held that the power to distrain for rent off the premises demised was a bill of sale within s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that, as the lease was not registered as a bill of sale, the distress was invalid. Another question was raised before us, which was that, assuming the power of distress to be valid, it was exercised too late to prevail against the debenture-holders of the company which was the lessee. This latter question turns upon circumstances which have no bearing on the decision on the Bills of Sale Act, and for the present it will be convenient to consider those facts only which are material to the extremely important question to which that Act gives rise.

The Roundwood Colliery Co., Ltd., is a company which at the date of the lease under which the distress was made was working a colliery at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, under a lease from a gentleman named Foljambe. This colliery had a shaft of its own through which the coal was raised; and which, of course, could be used for working any adjoining minerals which the company might acquire and properly work through Foljambe's colliery. By a lease dated Nov. 20, 1891, the Earl of Effingham demised to the company a seam of coal adjoining Foljambe's colliery at rents varying with the acreage worked. Although these rents were in the nature of royalties payable for the coal won, they were rents which could be distrained for at common law on the property demised without any express power of distress. This point was settled in Daniel v. Gracie (1). The lease, however, contained a power in case of non-payment of the rent to distrain upon and sell the goods and chattels of the company "in or about any of the premises hereby demised or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries." These last words give rise to the difficulty which has arisen. The seam of coal demised by the Effingham lease has always, in fact, been worked through the adjoining mine held by the company under Mr. Foljambe. It is plain, moreover, that this was always contemplated. The lease contained no demise of any surface lands; no provision was made for sinking any pit or shaft, and only one seam of coal was comprised in the lease.

The words "neighbouring colliery" are large enough to apply to collieries in the neighbourhood not worked with the seam of coal demised. I am, however, of opinion that to construe those words in that wide sense would be unreasonable and extravagant. The power of distress must, in my opinion, be construed to apply to those neighbouring mines only which, though not actually adjoining the seam of coal demised, might be or become connected with it by underground workings. This is a matter of some importance; for, if the power of distraining off the property demised extended to any goods and chattels of the lessee on any mines in the neighbourhood wholly unconnected with the property demised, the power would be very unusual, and might well be regarded as a licence to seize and sell chattels as distinguished from a power of distress for rent. If, however, the power is read as I read it, that is, as confined to the goods of the lessee on adjoining or neighbouring mines worked with the seam of coal demised, the power is one which is very common in mining leases where the minerals demised are to be worked through and with other mines worked by the same lessee. The precedent referred to by counsel for Lord Effingham from DAVIDSON'S, and KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S well-known collections, and other precedents which are to be found in BAINBRIDGE ON MINES (4th Edn.), p. 825, and in 3 BLYTHEWOOD'S PRECEDENTS BY ROBBINS (4th Edn.), p. 598, show that such a power is by no means uncommon in mineral leases. I do not say it is a usual clause which would be inserted if parties differed, but it is a clause very commonly inserted in such cases as I have mentioned.

Passing now to the Bills of Sale Acts, and speaking of them generally, it is impossible to read the preamble of the Act of 1854, which is the first of the series, without seeing that those Acts are not Acts to amend the law of real property, or the law relating to leases. The object of the Acts is to prevent secret pledges of chattels for money lent. It was not their object to interfere with leases or powers of distress for rents, although provision is made by s. 6 of the Act of 1878 for attornments and leases and powers of distress created to secure the repayment of money lent on the security of chattels. I will return to this section presently. Morton v. Woods (2) went far to show that the Act of 1854 did not apply to ordinary leases. In Daniel v. Stepney (3) the power of distress in a mining lease was extended to chattels off the land demised. The case was decided on demurrer. The pleadings might have raised, but did not raise, the point that the power was invalid under the Act of 1854 as against the plaintiffs, who were trustees for the lessee's creditors. The probable explanation of this is that, having regard to Morton v. Woods (2), the point was not considered worth raising. Other cases, especially Re Willis (4) and Re Standard Manufacturing Co. (5), may also be referred to as showing that distresses for rent, not reserved to secure some other debt, are outside the Bills of Sale Acts altogether.

As, however, the exact point which has to be determined has not yet been actually decided, it is necessary to examine more closely ss. 4 and 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, on which the case really turns. Section 4 provides that a bill of sale shall include "powers of attorney, authorities, or licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt."

Section 6 provides as follows :

"Every attornment, instrument, or agreement, not being a mining lease, whereby a power of distress is given or agreed to be given by any person to any other person by way of security for any present, future, or contingent debt or advance, and whereby any rent is reserved or made payable as a mode of providing for the payment of interest on such debt or advance, or otherwise for the purpose of such security only, shall be deemed to be a bill of sale, within the meaning of this Act, of any personal chattels which may be seized or taken under such power of distress: Provided that nothing in this section shall extend to any mortgage of any estate or interest in any land, tenement, or hereditament which the mortgagee, being in possession, shall have demised to the mortgagor as his tenant at a fair and reasonable rent."

It is plain that s. 6 was inserted in order to extend the operation of s. 4. Section 4 says what a bill of sale shall include. Powers of distress for rent are not mentioned.

The only words used in s. 4 which are material for the present purpose are "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt." Those words are the same as those used in the previous Act of 1854, see s. 7. But s. 6 is evidently based upon the supposition that powers of distress for rent are not within s. 4. Section 6 expressly deals with powers of distress, and says that such powers, if conferred by way of security for any debt or advance, are to be "deemed to be bills of sale"—language which plainly does not include an ordinary lease or distress for rent, which is not itself a security for some other debt. But then s. 6, while enacting that powers of distress if conferred by way of security for a debt or advance are to be deemed bills of sale, contains two exceptions, viz. (i) mining leases, and (ii) leases at fair and reasonable rents by mortgagees in possession to their mortgagors. Why mining leases were excepted from s. 6 I cannot say. Possibly it was to prevent any doubt arising as to the validity of powers of distress for payments which cannot be distrained for at common law, especially in those so-called mining leases which are mere licences to win and remove minerals. Anyhow, s. 6 cannot invalidate any mining lease, nor any power of distress which is commonly inserted in such a document.

The case, therefore, stands thus. If the power of distress in the present case is to be regarded as a power of distress for rent, it is out of the Bills of Sale Act altogether, and is neither within s. 4 nor within s. 6 of the Act of 1878. If, on the other hand, the power of distress in the present case is not to be regarded as a power of distress for rent, but as a power of distress for a debt, so as to fall within s. 6, then, being a common provision in a mining lease, it falls within the exception contained in the same section. Either way, therefore, it appears to me that this power is not invalidated by the Act of 1878. If, indeed, powers of distress for rent were "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within the meaning of s. 4 the case would be very different, for it is reasonably plain that the object and effect of s. 6 are to extend and not to curtail the operation of s. 4. Pulbrook v. Ashby & Co. (6), on which STIRLING, J., relied, appears to me quite consistent with the above view. The power of distress there was not for rent, but for the price of goods sold. Such a power clearly falls within s. 4. The decision was quite right. I have no doubt that a power of distress for rent off property demised might be so unusual and suspicious as to justify the inference that a lease containing such a power was being used as a cloak for a transaction which really fell within s. 4. But no such inference is possible in the present case. For these reasons I am unable to concur in the view taken by STIRLING, J., that the power of distress in this lease is invalid by reason of the Bills of Sale Act.

There remains the other point, to which the learned judge did not allude, viz., the right to distrain as against the debenture-holders of the company. The company had issued debentures in the ordinary form, and those debentures created what is called a floating charge on the goods and chattels of the company. On Sept. 24, 1896, the company resolved to wind-up voluntarily, and on Oct. 1, 1896, an ordinary debenture-holders' action was commenced. On Oct. 7, 1896, an order appointing a receiver was made, subject to his giving security. This order, however, was not drawn up, and there is no proof that the lessor [Lord Effingham] had notice of it. On Oct. 12, 1896, the lessor distrained and seized goods and chattels of the company which were off the property demised, viz., on Mr. Foljambe's adjoining colliery. On Oct. 13, 1896, the resolution to wind-up was confirmed, and a liquidator was appointed. The winding-up of the company commenced on this day. On Oct. 15, 1896, judgment was given in the debenture-holders' action, and the receiver, having given security, was appointed, and he proceeded to take possession of the property of the company. Shortly afterwards applications were made by the liquidator and by the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action to stay a sale of the goods distrained, and on Nov. 28, 1896, an order staying the sale was made, on the ground that the distress was invalid under the Bills of Sale Act.

This ground being, in my opinion, erroneous, it becomes necessary to consider the respective rights of the landlord and of the debenture-holders to the goods seized. These rights depend upon the question whether the landlord distrained while the debentures were still a floating security, or whether the debentures are to be regarded as having definitely attached to the goods seized, so that, as between the landlord and the debenture-holders, those goods had become the property of the latter before the landlord seized them. It is not contended that the landlord could distrain off the property demised on goods which were not the goods of the company, both at law and in equity. The debenture-holders contend that the goods seized were not the goods of the company, except subject to the equitable charge created by the debentures. As between the debenture-holders and the company this proposition is true, but it does not decide the respective rights of the lessor and the debenture-holders, which is what we have to consider. The goods seized by the lessor were seized under a power conferred either before the debentures were issued or while they were clearly a floating security, and in either case that power could be exercised before the debentures ceased to be floating securities. They did not cease to be so before the distress was put in. The winding-up did not commence until after that date, nor was any effectual order for a receiver made until after the same date. The order of Oct. 7 was never really effective. It was never drawn up, the lessor had no notice of it, and before the receiver could take possession he had to give security.

The distress, having been made before the commencement of the winding-up of the company, and before a receiver was effectively appointed, was, in my opinion, valid as against the debenture-holders. This conclusion is in accordance with the decision in Biggerstaffe v. Rowatt's Wharf, Ltd. (7)—the set-off case—and is not at all inconsistent with Re Opera, Ltd. (8), in which it was held that the sheriff could only seize the goods of a company subject to the equitable rights of the debenture-holders. The right of the sheriff to seize was not conferred by the debtor either before the debentures were issued or afterwards with the implied authority of their holders. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and the order appealed from should be reversed, with costs both here and below. If the goods seized have been sold by the receiver he must pay over the proceeds of sale to the lessor or so much of them as may be necessary to cover the rent distrained for and the costs of the distress.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case this court is asked to hold that a mining lease, granted by the Earl of Effingham for the purpose of enabling his lessees to work the demised coal, reserving therefor an acreage rent, is a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Acts, and, consequently, that the lease is void, it not having been registered pursuant to those Acts.

It appears that in the years 1890 and 1891 the Earl of Effingham and Mr. Foljambe were respectively owners of seams of coal lying adjacent to each other in the county of York. The shaft whereby these coals would be brought to bank was situated upon the lands of Mr. Foljambe. In these circumstances, in the year 1890 a mining lease was granted to a limited company by Mr. Foljambe, which contained the usual covenants to be found in mining leases, as also the covenant by the lessees to pay the rent reserved. It also contained the following power of distress:

“Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that if, and whenever any of the rents shall be in arrear for twenty-one days, the lessor, his heirs, or assigns may enter and seize, distrain, sell, and dispose of in the same manner as landlords may for rent in arrear, any engines, machinery, implements, tools, chattels, or effects then belonging to the lessees or their assigns, in or about any of the premises hereby demised, or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries.”

In 1891 the Earl of Effingham granted a similar lease of his seams of coal to the same lessees, and this lease contained an identical power of distress as that contained in the lease granted by Mr. Foljambe. In due course of working, the coal won by the lessees from the Earl of Effingham's seams was taken by them through the workings in Mr. Foljambe's land, and was brought to bank up the shaft constructed thereon, the coal from the two properties being thus worked together.

The question is: Is this lease by the Earl of Effingham a bill of sale? I should have thought off-hand that the answer would be "No." But STIRLING, J., has held the contrary, and as in argument it has been strongly insisted by counsel for the liquidator that he is right, the matter obviously requires serious examination. In the first place, I cannot doubt that, had the express power of distress in default of payment of the contracted rent contained in this lease by Lord Effingham been confined to seizing, distraining, selling, and disposing of the lessee's chattels in or about the demised premises, it could not have been maintained that the power caused the lease to be a bill of sale within the meaning of s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; for, though such a power might be said to be within the words "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," yet, in my judgment, such a power is not within either the object of, or the mischief aimed at by, the Bills of Sale Acts, which apply to dealings between creditors and debtors and not to leases between landlords and tenants.

The object of the Bills of Sale Acts was not to bring bona fide leases within the provisions of those Acts. Such leases are outside those Acts altogether. In Re Willis (4) LINDLEY, L.J., sets forth the true view of the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts, 1854 and 1878. He points out that if those Acts are looked at it will be seen that what the legislature was aiming at was not the case of leases between landlords and tenants, but the rendering of it compulsory on lenders of money on the security of goods and chattels to register their securities, and that, if money be lent on the security of chattels, this must be done by a registered bill of sale, and in that I entirely agree. BOWEN, L.J., also, when delivering the judgment of this court in Re Standard Manufacturing Co. (5), showed that, until the passing of the Act of 1882, the express and avowed design of the legislature was to strike at frauds perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale; and that, although the general words in the Act—the question before the court there was whether debentures of a joint-stock company were bills of sale—were large enough to include debentures, yet they could not, considering the manifest objects of the Acts, be brought within their meaning. I cannot think that, though in a mining lease, or indeed in any other lease, there be an express power to distrain upon the demised premises, such a power comes within the true meaning of the words "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," and thus render the lease a bill of sale, and I have no doubt that it does not. Indeed this was not disputed at the Bar; but why not, if such a power is within the actual words of s. 4 of the Act of 1878?

It was said that such an express power in a lease was merely the expression of the right that every landlord possessed at common law—namely, a right of distress upon the demised premises, and was not, therefore, within the meaning of the words of the section. But I think that the true answer to be given is, because real leases with real rents reserved are not within the scope of the Bills of Sale Acts at all. I do not doubt that there may be provisions inserted in a lease which would bring the instrument, although principally a lease, within the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts, and Pulbrook v. Ashby & Co. (6) is an instance of this. There, by the lease, the landlord took an express power to distrain upon the demised premises for money due for goods sold and delivered by him to the tenant, and this power of distress was held to be a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within s. 4, and in this I agree. It was a power having no relation whatever to rent due from a tenant to his landlord; it was altogether outside the relationship of landlord and tenant, and had reference to that of debtor and creditor. To get a lease within s. 4 of the Act of 1878 there must be in the lease something in addition to and dehors the lease which sins against the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts.

STIRLING, J., said the present case was

“on all fours with that of a lessor granting an ordinary lease of a house, but reserving to himself a power to distrain on goods of the lessee found in another house not comprised in the lease;”

and he thought that “such a power would be ‘a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt.’” Such a power, I apprehend, would be wholly exceptional if not unique. I never saw the like. If the power to distrain in the present case gave power to distrain upon the goods of the lessee, say in Grosvenor Square, as was put in argument, I should have thought that such an exceptional and peculiar power might legitimately give rise to the inference that it was not really a power whereby to enforce the landlord’s usual and ordinary rights against his tenant, but inserted for some other purpose foreign to the relationship of landlord and tenant, in which case the instrument might well be held to be a lease and something more, which something more might then come within the words of s. 4 as a “licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt,” and thus be a bill of sale, and require to be registered. But that case is not this case. In the present case the power to distrain upon “any adjoining or neighbouring colliery” is by no means unique or exceptional in mining leases. It is a power inserted in mining leases when it is intended that two collieries are to be worked together as in the present case, and so we find a like power was inserted in the lease by Mr. Foljambe. Similar forms of powers are to be found in the recognised and well-known precedents of forms of mining leases. To these LINDLEY, L.J., has referred.

The true construction of this power to distrain upon “any adjoining or neighbouring collieries” is not, in my opinion, a power that the lessor may distrain upon the lessees’ chattels upon any collieries in the neighbourhood, no matter where situated upon which the lessees might happen to have chattels. The power is expressly confined to adjoining or neighbouring collieries, and it would be a most unreasonable, and not the true construction of the power, to hold that it extended to collieries wholly unconnected with the demised seams of coal. It is a power limited by the subject-matter to which it was applied, viz., a power to distrain upon an adjoining or neighbouring colliery worked as in this case in connection with the demised premises. I cannot bring myself to think that the present lease is a mining lease and something more, for, in my judgment, it is a mining lease and nothing more, and, therefore, not a bill of sale within the true intent and meaning of s. 4 of the Act of 1878.

As regards the argument of counsel for Lord Eftingham founded upon s. 6, viz., that this section comprises real bona fide transactions between real landlords and real tenants in which are reserved real rentals, and consequently as leases are within s. 6, they are not within s. 4, I am by no means convinced that s. 6 applies in any way to what I will call real bona fide leases between landlords and tenants with real rents, and, in my opinion, it does not. In my view, s. 6 was intended to defeat the schemes of lenders of money who had resort to forms embracing ostensibly the relation of landlords and tenants for the purpose of securing their advances and the accruing interest thereon, and that it does not embrace the case of real bona fide leases with actual rents. But if I am wrong as to this, and s. 6 does include such leases, though I think it does not, then it is obvious it does not include the present case, for mining leases are expressly excepted from the section. As regards the further point which was taken by counsel for the liquidator that, if the power to distrain be held valid, and the lease not a bill of sale, in that case the distress could not be made effective against the debenture-holders, I have nothing to add to what my brother LINDLEY has said thereon, and I agree with him. For these reasons I think this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—Concurring as I do in the judgments already given, I will only A say, out of respect for the learned judge from whose judgment we are differing, so much as will explain my view of the true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. By s. 3 the Act is to apply to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale.”

The definition of “bill of sale,” which is contained in s. 4, comprises “licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt,” words which were found in the previous Act of 1854.

Having regard to the purview of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, I am satisfied C that it never was intended to include powers of distress contained in mining leases, or others which are reserved or incident by the common law to landlords in any usual and well-known form of lease. I think that this was clearly established before the passing of the Act of 1878, and, indeed, there were decisions which seem to me to have gone much further—namely, those which held that, where in mortgages there was an attornment at what is called a “rent,” and what technically is a rent, but which was not a rent incident to any ordinary agreement between D landlord and tenant, but a mere security for money, it was nevertheless outside the Act. By reason of those decisions it was thought necessary to insert the provision included in the Act of 1878, s. 6. The effect of that section is, to my mind, that, with the express exception therein contained of mining leases and leases made by mortgagees who have actually entered into possession and actually made a demise E to their mortgagors, artificial rents created by attornment and also by powers of distress are not to be treated as arrangements between landlord and tenant, but that the existence of them will be treated as nothing more than giving licences to seize chattels as security for a debt, and that consequently they are within the Bills of Sale Act.

Therefore, for my part I do not doubt that the power of distress, even though F it be contained and included in the lease, may be of such a nature as to be entirely outside the scope of ordinary agreements between landlord and tenant; and I should accept such a case as that of a brewer’s lease as one of those cases. I think that if in a lease you take a power of distress over property entirely unconnected with the demised premises, that would be outside; as for instance, where there is a demise of one house—as in the case put by the learned judge in the court below—G with a power of distress over the chattels in another. That is because no one could suppose that in the ordinary course of events the owner of a town house had in any way pledged his furniture for the rent of a property which might be situated far away in the country, and with which there was no apparent connection at all. Such a power of distress, it appears to me, would really be a licence to seize whatever H chattels there might be in the house at the time when it was exercised; and with regard to those chattels in that house the rent would not be rent at all; it would be a debt, and nothing else.

That being so, we have to consider whether we can distinguish the present case from cases of that description. I think that we can, and on this plain ground. Here we have a mining lease containing provisions which, construed as they have been by LINDLEY, L.J.—a construction from which I do not differ—are, I will not I say “usual,” because I have no means of knowing whether they are usual or not, but at any rate not uncommon and not unreasonable terms in a mining lease, where the minerals are of necessity worked through an adjoining or neighbouring mine in the sense which we give to the words in this lease, and where the chattels may or may not be at the moment when a distress is being put in on the very mine which is the subject of the lease, or on the mine through which the minerals are being carried. The reasonableness of that view is made more clear by the fact that there may be mining leases in which powers of distress are given, although there be no absolute interest in any land or in any minerals demised. Though a well-known incidence of the mining industry, they are not in any way, according to my view, within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act. I think, therefore, that this power of distress is fairly within what is understood to be an arrangement between the owners of a mine and the person who works under a lease from him, or a licence from him through a neighbouring mine. With regard to the other question about debenture-holders, since the learned judge in the court below did not deal with that, I have nothing to add, except that I agree with what has been said on that point.

Solicitor—Costs—Recovery—Limitation of action—Time to run from date of completion of work—Effect of Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 73), s. 37.

By s. 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 [now Solicitors Act, 1957, s. 68] no solicitor shall commence an action for the recovery of fees until the expiration of one month after he has delivered a bill of costs to the client.

Held: this section did not affect the date when the cause of action arose, but dealt only with the procedure by which the solicitor's right might be enforced, and, therefore, the period of limitation for the action ran from the date of the completion of the work for which the solicitor had been retained and not from the expiration of one month from the delivery of the bill.

Notes. As to limitation of actions of contract see now s. 2 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, which provides that such actions shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from "the date on which the cause of action accrued." For the provision that an action to recover solicitors' costs cannot be brought until one month after delivery of the bill of costs, see now s. 68 of the Solicitors Act, 1957.

Appeal from a decision of CHARLES, J., in an action brought by a solicitor against his client on a bill of costs.

On May 30, 1889, the work for which the defendant had retained the plaintiff was completed. On June 7 the defendant left the United Kingdom and remained beyond the seas until 1896. On June 12 the plaintiff posted a letter, containing a signed bill of costs, to the defendant at his place of address. On June 12, 1896, the present action was commenced, the defendant having returned to England a few weeks previously. Under these circumstances, the defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

At the trial of the action without a jury CHARLES, J., held that the six years' limitation began to run under the Limitation Act, 1623, on May 30, 1889, when the work was completed, and that the plaintiff's right of action was, therefore, barred, and he gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

By the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, it was provided that all actions of debt grounded on any lending or contract without specialty should be commenced within six years "next after the cause of such actions or suit and not after." By the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, s. 19, time did not begin to run during the absence of the defendant beyond the seas.

By the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37, it was provided :

"No attorney or solicitor . . . shall commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements for any business done by such attorney or solicitor until the expiration of one month after such attorney or solicitor . . . shall have delivered unto the party to be charged therewith . . ."

Atherley Jones, Q.C., and H. M. Sturges for the plaintiff.
Jelf, Q.C., and F. M. Abrahams for the defendant.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I think that this appeal fails. It is admitted by the plaintiff that his appeal must fail if his cause of action arose on his completion of the work which he was retained to do, and it is also admitted by the defendant that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment if the cause of action did not arise until one month had elapsed after the delivery of the signed bill of costs.

No question arises as to the construction of any Statute of Limitations. In order to succeed, the plaintiff must have commenced the action within six years of his cause of action, and the only question is as to the moment when that cause of action came into existence. The action is to recover payment for work done by the plaintiff in his profession of solicitor. In an ordinary case in which a man has agreed to do work for reward, and has made no agreement with the person for whom the work is to be done as to the date when payment is to be made, he has a right to demand payment the moment he has completed the work which he had agreed to perform, and if he has not been paid, he may commence an action to recover the money due to him directly he has completed the work. Before the passing of any legislation affecting a solicitor's right of action on a bill of costs, the solicitor was in exactly the same position as anyone else with regard to suing for payment for work done by him at another's request. There was no necessity for him to deliver to the defendant a bill of costs before issuing a writ. Therefore, the question we have to consider is whether the cause of action, which formerly arose the moment that the agreed work was completed, has been taken away or in any way altered by legislation.

It is clear that no Act of Parliament has absolutely taken away from solicitors the right to sue for payment for work done, but it has been contended that the right to sue immediately on the completion of the work has been taken away. The Limitation Act, 1623, only affects the procedure by which a right may be enforced, in a case where the person having the right neglects for six years to enforce it. Does the Solicitors Act, 1843, deal with a cause of action, or merely with the procedure by which that cause of action can be enforced? Section 37 provides that no solicitor shall "commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements" except under certain conditions. The section assumes that the solicitor has a right to be paid the fees and charges, and provides that that right shall not be enforced by an action until after a certain time has elapsed. The section only deals with the right to bring an action. If a solicitor is in a position to enforce his claim by any other method than an action, he is apparently not affected by the statute. For instance, if a solicitor has in his possession money belonging to his client, that is to say, money not deposited with him for any specific purpose, there is nothing in this section, so far as I can see, that would prevent the solicitor from retaining the money in payment for work done by him for his client, though the solicitor should not have previously delivered to the client a signed bill of costs. If that be the true construction of the Act, it is clear that the solicitor's cause of action is not affected by s. 37, which only touches one of the remedies by which that cause of action may be enforced.

The meaning of the expression "cause of action" was discussed in the course of the argument, and reference was made to my judgment, in Read v. Brown (1), which was decided in 1888. I there said (22 Q.B.D. at p. 131):

"What is the real meaning of the phrase, 'a cause of action arising in the City.'? It has been defined in Cooke v. Gill (2) to be this: every fact which it would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove, if traversed, in order to support his right to the judgment of the court. It does not comprise every piece of evidence which is necessary to prove each fact, but every fact which is necessary to be proved."

The reference there to the traversing of the facts which the plaintiff must prove was intended to make it clear that the facts referred to were the facts which the plaintiff must allege in his statement of claim. Formerly, if a plaintiff failed to aver in his declaration the facts necessary to support his claim, the defendant might have demurred. If he asserted those facts and they were traversed, it lay upon him to prove them. If they were not traversed, he was relieved from the necessity of proving them. Therefore, I think that what I said in Read v. Brown (1) was perfectly correct.

But then it was argued that what I there said was inconsistent with what was laid down in a later case in 1891, namely, Reeves v. Butcher (3), by LINDLEY, L.J., in which FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred. LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 511):

"This expression, 'cause of action,' has been repeatedly the subject of decision, and it has been held, particularly in Hemp v. Garland (4), decided in 1843, that the cause of action arises at the time when the debt could first have been recovered by action. The right to bring an action may arise on various events, but it has always been held that the statute runs from the earliest time at which an action could be brought."

With deference, I do not think that what LINDLEY, L.J., there laid down differs in any way from the judgment I gave in Read v. Brown (1), and I take it to be perfectly correct. If the plaintiff alleges facts which, if not traversed, would prima facie entitle him to recover, then he shows a good cause of action.

Taking the present case, the plaintiff might have commenced the action as soon as the work was completed. If the defendant made no answer to the claim, the plaintiff would have recovered. The defendant could not formerly have demurred to such a claim, which showed a good cause of action. The claim would have been good in form unless the defendant did something to defeat it. The defendant could only have put forward the Solicitors Act by way of answer to what was on the face of it a good claim by the plaintiff. For these reasons, therefore, I think the cause of action in the present case was "given or accrued, fallen or come," as soon as the plaintiff had completed the work. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question really is whether the time within which such an action as the present must be brought runs from the date of the completion of the work or from the expiration of one month after the delivery of the signed bill of costs under s. 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. In the one case the defendant will succeed; in the other he will fail. Under the Statute of Limitations this action must be brought within six years after the cause of action arose, and that is subject to the proviso that time will not begin to run during the absence of the defendant beyond the seas. Therefore, the question is when the cause of action arose. For the defendant it is contended that it arose in 1889, as soon as the work was completed which the plaintiff was retained to do, and it seems to me that that contention is correct. Before any special legislation with regard to solicitors' bills of costs, there is no doubt that an action would lie as soon as the work was done, without any bill of costs being previously delivered. What were the rules of pleading before the Judicature Act in such a case? The solicitor would have sued in indebitatus assumpsit for work and labour done. If the defendant simply pleaded never indebted, the cause of action would clearly be admitted to have arisen, if at all, when the work was done. If the defendant wished to rely upon the statutory defence of non-delivery of a bill of costs he would have pleaded it specially. The proof of delivery of a bill was not part of the plaintiff's case. That point was one put forward by the defendant in support of his own case. How, then, can it be said that the plaintiff's cause of action was not complete until the bill of costs had been delivered? If that contention were correct the plaintiff could not have declared in indebitatus assumpsit, he must have used a special count framed under the Solicitors Act. No such form as that was ever used. I think that that clearly shows that the cause of action in such a case as the present accrues when the work is completed.

The Limitation Act, 1623, only bars the remedy, it does not destroy the right. Section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, seems to me to assume that there is a cause of action, and merely postpones the bringing of the action upon it until the expiration of one month after the delivery of a bill of costs. I see nothing in the section which in any way contradicts the view that the cause of action arose as soon as the work was completed. Then in answer to that it was urged that, if so, a solicitor would have less time, by one month, than anyone else in which he might commence an action for work and labour. That may be so; but on the other hand, if that argument of the plaintiff is right, a solicitor could, by refraining from delivering his bill, keep his right of action alive as long as he liked. That would be a most undesirable result. Sundry cases were referred to in which attempts

A have been made to define what is "a cause of action." I agreed, and I still agree with the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls in Read v. Brown (1), and I do not think the opinion of LINDLEY, L.J., in Reeves v. Butcher (3) in any way militates against it. I may add that LINDLEY, L.J., tells me that what he said in that case was not intended to have reference to a case like the present.

B CHITTY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must fail. The Limitation Act, 1623, was passed with the object of affording a certain amount of protection, not an absolute protection, against stale demands. The statute does not bar the debt, it only takes away the remedy by action. It also, like the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, draws a distinction between "action," and "cause of action," and for the present purpose there appears to me to be no substantial difference between C the two Acts. The question in this case is when the cause of action arose? For the plaintiff it is said to have arisen only one month after the delivery of the bill, and reliance was placed upon s. 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. That section, I think, only creates a limitation with regard to the remedy, and does not affect the cause of action. It postpones the right of action but does not touch the cause of action which is the doing of the work. My brother LOPES has referred to D BULLEN AND LEAKE ON PLEADING, and I should like to refer to an older work, CHITTY ON PLEADING. On looking at the seventh edition, published in 1844, that is to say after the passing of the Solicitors Act, 1843, it is plain that the pleaders of those days did not think it necessary to aver delivery of a bill and the subsequent lapse of one month, as part of the plaintiff's cause of action, and pleaders in those days had to be most careful in ascertaining exactly what was the cause of E action and averring the necessary facts.

It is, therefore, material, I think, to see what they did in such a case as the present. I accept the definition of "cause of action" given by the Master of the Rolls in Read v. Brown (1), and I am satisfied that nothing was said by LINDLEY, L.J., in Reeves v. Butcher (3) which was meant to alter that definition. It is true F that one result of our decision will be that a solicitor has only five years and eleven months in which he can begin an action on his bill of costs. I do not shrink from that result. It is to be observed, on the other hand, that, if this appeal had succeeded, a solicitor could, by not delivering his bill, postpone for any length of time, so far as I can see, his power of bringing an action. Then again it was urged G that the court might say that the solicitor would be bound to deliver his bill within a reasonable time after the work was done. That suggestion does not seem to me to be satisfactory, because it is entirely contrary to the whole principles of Statutes of Limitations, the object of which is to fix a period beyond which actions shall not be brought, instead of leaving it to the court in each case to decide what is an unreasonable delay. Moreover I do not see how to extract from the language of the Solicitors' Act any such proposition as that, that a solicitor is to deliver his H bill within a reasonable time.

There is one matter which I will allude to, though the argument from analogies is a dangerous one. An author whose copyright is infringed has an immediate right of action, but by s. 24 of the Copyright Act, 1842, it is provided that no proprietor of copyright in any book published after the passing of the Act shall maintain any action or suit in respect of any infringement of such copyright, I unless he shall before commencing such action or suit, have caused an entry to be made in the register of the Stationers' Company of such book pursuant to the Act. I cannot see, if the plaintiff's argument here is correct, why an author should not, if he likes, delay registering his copyright for twenty years and so postpone the commencement of an action for infringement.

DAWSON AND OTHERS v. AFRICAN CONSOLIDATED LAND AND TRADING CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Chitty and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), November 10, 1897]

46 W.R. 132; 14 T.L.R. 30; 42 Sol. Jo. 45; 4 Mans. 372]

Company—Director—Defect in appointment—Article providing that acts valid notwithstanding defect—Application to transactions between company and shareholders—Resolution making call on shareholders—Director who had ceased to hold qualification shares for short period not formally re-appointed—Director undischarged bankrupt when appointed.

Article 114 of a company provided that "all acts done at any meeting of the directors . . . or by any person acting as director, shall, notwithstanding that it shall be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such directors . . . or that they or any of them were disqualified, be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director." Article 96 provided that the office of director should be vacated "if he became bankrupt," or if he ceased to hold the qualification shares. Of the three directors of the company, T., N. and S., N., who had originally held qualification shares, unknown to the other directors had ceased to hold them for the period June 17 to June 23, 1897, and was never formally re-elected director when he again acquired qualification shares, while T. was an undischarged bankrupt at the time of his appointment. On June 23, 1897, T., N. and S. passed a resolution making calls on the plaintiffs in respect of shares held by them. The plaintiffs brought an action against the company claiming that the resolution was invalid on the ground that T. and N. had vacated their directorships before the date of the resolution. Pending the trial of the action the plaintiffs were granted an interlocutory injunction restraining the company from forfeiting, selling or re-allotting their shares and from taking proceedings to recover the amount of the call.

Held: (i) art. 114 applied to transactions between the company and the shareholders, such as calls made by the company on a shareholder, as well as to transactions between the company and strangers, and, therefore, the irregularity in N.'s appointment caused by failure of his co-directors to re-appoint him, was cured by art. 114 and the resolution was valid (Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1) (1860), 5 H. & N. 151, distinguished); (ii) with regard to T., art. 96 did not apply to the facts of the case for it did not prevent the appointment of a bankrupt as a director; accordingly, the order for an injunction would be set aside.

Notes. As to the validity of acts of directors see now s. 180 of the Companies Act, 1948. By virtue of s. 187 of the Companies Act, 1948, an undischarged bankrupt cannot now act as director except with the leave of the court by which he was adjudged bankrupt.

Appeal from an order of RIDLEY, J., on a motion by the plaintiffs, shareholders in the defendant company, for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants, until judgment in the action or further order, from forfeiting shares held by the plaintiffs, selling, allotting or otherwise disposing of the shares and from taking proceedings to recover the amount of calls made on the plaintiffs.

The articles of association of the company contained the following provisions:—
By art. 41 shares might for nonpayment of calls after notice “be forfeited by a resolution of the directors to that effect.” Article 90 provided that the number of the directors “shall not be less than three nor more than seven.” Article 93 provided that no person other than the first directors should be qualified to be a director who was not “the holder of shares of the company of the nominal value of £200.” Article 96 provided that the office of a director should be vacated (inter alia) “if he became bankrupt, . . . or if he cease to hold the required amount of shares to qualify him for office.” Article 105 provided that until otherwise determined two directors should be a quorum.

Article 114 provided :

There were three directors of the company, Thomas Thompson, A. B. Neilson, and E. G. Sanders. They made a call on the shareholders, and threatened to forfeit their shares for nonpayment of the calls. The plaintiffs alleged that the resolution making the call, which purported to be a resolution of the directors, was invalid, because Neilson who had been a director had ceased to be such by reason of his having for a short period lost his qualification. Neilson had originally held qualification shares but for a short period—from June 17 until June 23, 1897—he had ceased to hold any shares, and had been off the register of shareholders and he had never been formally re-elected after he had again acquired his qualification. Thompson was also objected to by the plaintiffs on the ground that he was an undischarged bankrupt at the time of his appointment, and it was said that he, therefore, vacated his directorship immediately on his appointment.

The plaintiffs accordingly brought an action against the company and Thompson, Neilson, and Sanders, and then moved before RIDLEY, J., sitting as vacation judge, for an interlocutory injunction. His LORDSHIP granted the injunction. From that decision the defendants appealed.

Alexander, Q.C., and W. Higgins for the defendants.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Stewart Smith for the plaintiffs.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—This appeal is against an order of RIDLEY, J., granting an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from forfeiting certain shares, and from selling or re-allotting such shares, and from taking proceedings to recover money raised by a call on those shares. The ground upon which the motion was made before him was simply that there had been certain alleged irregularities in the appointment of the directors who had made the call. Before us, other grounds have been urged to which I will allude presently.

The various suggested irregularities, when they come to be examined, are nothing more or less than small irregularities. There is no radical defect in any one of them. I take the best. I do not propose to allude to any of the others, because I think that they are really beneath notice; but I take the best of them, which is the case of Mr. Neilson. It appears that there were originally three directors appointed by the proper parties, that is to say, as I understand it, by the subscribers to the memorandum of association. Those three were Messrs. Bradford, Sanders, and Griffiths. Nobody quarrels with their appointment. Mr. Bradford died on April 13, 1887, and a Mr. Thompson was appointed a director in his place under an article which clearly authorised that appointment, subject to the point that he was an undischarged bankrupt. What I mean is this: that it was a casual vacancy which the other two directors had power to fill, and they filled it by appointing him. There was a meeting afterwards of the shareholders, and Mr. Thompson then retired and was re-elected. It was said that the shareholders did not know that he was an undischarged bankrupt, and our attention is called to a clause in the articles of association, that a director vacates his appointment if he becomes bankrupt. But that clause does not apply to the facts with which we have to deal; and it appears to me to have been perfectly competent for the shareholders, if they chose to do so, to appoint Mr. Thompson.

Mr. Neilson was appointed in succession to the other gentlemen, Mr. Griffiths, who died in December, 1896. That was all right, and Mr. Neilson was a competent man, and Mr. Neilson remained a competent man, and a properly qualified director, till June 17, 1897, when it appears that he transferred all his shares, and for five or six days from June 17 to June 23 he had no shares. So under one of the clauses of the articles of association he vacated his office. On June 23 he acquired other shares and again became qualified. There was a meeting of the directors on June 24, at which he was present, and he acted as a director. Then, again, there was a casual vacancy which the other two directors had power to fill up, and, although it is true that they did not go through the form of passing a resolution appointing him a director, they accepted him as a director, and they allowed him to act as one; and when this call, which is impeached, was made—namely, on June 23, 1897—it was made by Mr. Thompson, Mr. Sanders, and Mr. Neilson. Mr. Neilson was then a properly qualified director, so that this irregularity, which is supposed to upset everything that was done, is reduced to this—that two of the directors who might have passed the resolution appointing Mr. Neilson did not go through the form of passing a resolution to appoint him, but acted with him as a duly appointed director. If that is not an irregularity in his appointment such as is attempted to be cured by the article which I will allude to presently, I cannot conceive what is. The objections raised are to my mind trivial and unbusinesslike, and have not a shadow of substance in them. But they are technical defects which have been laid hold of for the purpose of upsetting what has been done.

I pass to article 114, which is that

“all acts done at any meeting of the directors, or of a committee of directors, or by any person acting as a director, shall, notwithstanding that it shall be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such directors or persons acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified, be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed, and was qualified to be a director.”

It is reducing that clause to a nullity to say that it does not apply to such trivial defects and irregularities as those with which we have to deal here. But then it is said that there is authority on the point, and we are told that we must, under the stress of Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1), hold that this article does not apply to such irregularities as these. I do not understand how Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1) can be cited as an authority to the effect that such an article as art. 114 only applies to outsiders dealing bona fide with the company without notice. Of course it applies to and covers all such transactions. But there is nothing that I can discover in the judgments in Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1) which warrants the contention that this clause does not apply to calls and matters of that kind as between the company on the one side and the shareholders on the other side. Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1) is intelligible up to a certain point, and as to the rest of it, it is so reported in 5 H. & N. that I confess that I do not thoroughly understand it. But the defect which the court put their finger down upon in Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1) was this: It was said that the persons there who made the call had been improperly appointed by three out of seven of the subscribers to the memorandum of association, which was all wrong. It was all wrong, and the validating clause there, namely, cl. 60, which was similar in its terms to art. 114 here, did not cure that radical defect in their appointment. The court having so held, upset the call, and declared that the call was invalid. So far it is plain enough, and that was the ratio decidendi, and that I follow perfectly well.

Then comes a part of the case which I do not follow with equal ease. Granting that the appointment of the gentlemen as directors was altogether wrong, as it obviously was, and granting that the validating clause there did not apply, I do not see myself that it necessarily follows that what they did, although they had been improperly appointed, would not be validated. I do not see that any of the judges, in giving judgment in that case, addressed himself to that point. There may be very good grounds for it. It may be that the clause did not apply even to that, because there was no subsequent discovery about it. The whole thing was above board, and the defect was taken to be known to everybody. I do not know how that may be, but it is no authority to my mind for the proposition for which it was put forward in the present case, and which will alone assist the respondents here, namely, that art. 114 does not apply to such matters as forfeiture of shares for nonpayment of calls, that is to say, to matters between the company on the one side and the shareholders on the other. I cannot conceive why we should cut down such general language as that, and say that it applies only to outsiders. I think that that is wrong. It appears to me, therefore, that these objections, whatever they might be worth but for this clause—and I do not think that they would be worth much without this clause—are absolutely nothing at all with it.

There is another point taken before us which is perhaps a much more serious one, or, rather, would be a much more serious one, if there were any evidence to support it. We are asked to restrain this proceeding of making calls and forfeiting shares and so on, because the calls had been made for an improper purpose, not for the purpose of bona fide carrying on the business of the company, but for the purpose of recouping the people who have paid off the promoters under agreements which are sought to be rescinded. When you look at the writ, the writ impeaches the agreement. This is a point which might have become important. What we are told is this, that the agreement has been carried out and everything done under it, and it is a little difficult for one shareholder to sue on behalf of himself and others to rescind an agreement between the company on the one side and the promoters on the other, which the company might have chosen to carry out in form. That form of action has to be justified, and there is no justification that I can see, even for suggesting it. But, apart from that, there is no evidence to support such an objection as this. It is a difficult case to prove, and it must be proved, if at all, at the trial. This is a mere suggestion of fraud and misconduct—a mere suggestion as to which we have nothing reliable to act upon. This part of the case was not dealt with by the learned judge in the court below at all, and we are left to deal with it as best we can. We have heard counsel for the plaintiffs describe what took place in the court below, and it is far from sufficient to enable us to grant an interlocutory injunction. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the order discharged with costs here and below.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. One word as to the 114th article in the articles of association. That article is not framed so as to render valid a resolution passed by any persons who assumed to act as directors of a company. The case was put by counsel during the argument that it necessarily follows that where any three or four persons went into the board-room and said: "Here we are directors," and then passed a resolution that the clause would, according to the contention on the other side, support their acts and make them valid. The mere reading, however, of the clause disposes of that. The clause is addressed, as is shown by the words "notwithstanding some defect in the appointment of the directors or persons acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified," to cases of that kind.

The point arose on the facts with reference to Neilson. Neilson was six days without the necessary qualification shares, namely, from June 17 to June 23. There is no evidence whatever to show that the other two directors were aware that he had parted with all his shares so as no longer to hold his qualification shares. It is said, and rightly said upon reading the articles, that he ceased to be a director because he ceased to hold the qualification shares. But on June 23 he held the qualification shares, and he went on acting as director with the other directors; and on the material date, June 23, when the resolution for the call was passed, they treated him as a director. There cannot be the slightest question that, if their attention had been drawn to the defect, they would have appointed him then and there to fill the vacancy. The exact point here is the defect in the appointment of Neilson. There is no defect in the appointment if you treat him as appointed originally. The defect was that he had become disqualified. It was agreed that there was no distinction between the defect in the appointment and the words relating to disqualification; but the words are "disqualification," and not "non-qualification at the time of appointment," which plainly refers to subsequent loss of the qualification which is required in order to enable a person to act as director. That is exactly within the words of the article. It is just one of these defects, irregularities, or whatever name of that kind one ought to call them by, which is protected by the clause.

It is then said that the article is not to operate as between the company on the one hand and the members of the company on the other; but that it is only to be applied to outsiders. The answer to that objection is, that on the face of the clause itself no such distinction is made. Whether in any case a distinction might be taken is quite another matter. It cannot be taken upon the facts of this case, and I am quite satisfied that the article does apply as between the company on the one hand and the member who is being sued for a call in the present case on the other. It is hardly necessary to add any words about Howbeach Coal Co., Ltd. v. Teague (1). There it was quite plain that the directors who were purporting to act, and whose appointment was derived from the acts of the signatories, were not well appointed; and it may well be in that case, having regard to cl. 60, the court considered that that was not a defect within the meaning of cl. 60. The reasons are not given by the learned judges why they said that cl. 60 in that case did not apply. It is quite open to say that in that particular case the appointment was so radically bad that it did not fall within the protection. For these reasons, and in conformity with what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls, I think that all these points with reference to irregularity and the like fall to the ground and are abortive; and I think it is quite unnecessary to go through somewhat similar matters which have been mentioned. This seems to me to be the only one that requires anything like a formal judgment.

Then there is the other point which was put forward at the bar before us on this appeal, that the call was made for a fraudulent or improper purpose; that the directors made the call in the interests of some one of them; and that the call on that ground could not be supported. Having regard to the position of the company, as well as other matters, it would require a strong case on the motion to justify us in saying that in such circumstances the call was fraudulently made. The simple answer that we have to give is, that the evidence has not proved in any material degree the kind of case that was shadowed out by counsel for the plaintiffs. I reserve to myself the full power of considering whether three shareholders can sue effectively on any such materials as have been presented to us for the rescission of the company's contract. But really the point does not arise, because there is no case brought forward to show a preponderating control over the company's affairs by those who now have the direction of them. Nothing of the sort has been presented to us which would justify some of the shareholders, two or three of the shareholders, in instituting this action against the company, and asking that the company's contract should be rescinded.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I only wish to say that it is not necessary to decide anything about the true meaning of the words "afterwards discovered," because, as the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, in this case there is no evidence whatever that the directors did know of this defect at the time of the passing of the resolution in question.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Mortgage by assignee by sub-demise—Mortgagee in possession of demised lands—Payment of rent by lessee under covenant in principal lease—Lessee's right to recover from mortgagee.

An under-lessee, who is a mortgagee by way of demise from an assignee of the lessee and is in possession of the demised lands, cannot be sued for money paid by the lessee when the lessee has been compelled, according to his covenant, to pay the rent reserved by the principal lease, for such an under-lessee is not liable to the original lessor for the rent, there being between him and the original lessor neither contract nor privity of estate, and he has not, within either the equitable or the common law principle of common liability with the lessee, such an interest in the lease that it can be said that the payment by the lessee of the rent reserved by the lease was a payment for his benefit or relief.

Appeal from a decision of CHANNELL, J., at the trial without a jury of an action brought by the lessees of certain premises against the defendants, mortgagees by way of sub-demise from the assignee of the lessees, to recover the sum of £97, the amount of rent which the plaintiffs had been compelled, under their lease, to pay to the landlord in respect of a period during which the defendants had been in possession of the demised premises. E

By indenture of lease dated April 3, 1882, Henry Moore demised certain houses to the plaintiffs for the term of 99 years at the yearly rent of £20 payable quarterly. The lease contained a covenant by the plaintiffs to pay the rent reserved and also a proviso for re-entry for non-payment of rent. On April 5, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned the residue of the term to Edward Price who covenanted to pay the rent reserved by the lease and to indemnify the plaintiffs with regard thereto. On Oct. 18, 1889, Price mortgaged the premises by way of sub-demise to the defendants, for the whole of the remainder of the term, less one day. The mortgage deed contained a covenant by the mortgagees that, if they should enter into possession of the mortgaged premises and receive the rents and profits, they would out of moneys so received by them in the first place pay the rent reserved by the lease of April 3, 1882. On Nov. I 13, 1881, Price was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendants entered into possession of the premises and received the rents and profits, but did not pay the yearly rent of £20 reserved by the lease of April 3, 1882. Accordingly, the plaintiffs were compelled to pay the rent which became due while the defendants were in possession and brought the present action to recover £97, the amount paid by them. At the trial of the action by CHANNELL, J., without a jury, the learned judge gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Bray, Q.C., and H. Tindal Atkinson for the plaintiffs.

Jelf, Q.C., and Grimwood Mears (G. Spencer Bower with them) for the defendants.

Nov. 30, 1898. The following judgments were read.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by plaintiffs who are lessees of premises for a long term to recover from the defendants £97, being rent they have had to pay to their lessor under a covenant in their lease, which rent accrued during the time the defendants were in possession of the premises as mortgagees by way of demise from an assignee of the term. Between the plaintiffs and the defendants there exists neither contract nor privity of estate; the defendants were not liable to pay to the plaintiffs the rent in question, nor were they liable to pay it to the plaintiffs' lessor. In these circumstances my brother CHANNELL gave judgment for the defendants, being of opinion that the action was not maintainable, and that the principle of the decision in Moule v. Garrett (1) did not apply, the defendants being under-lessees and not assignees of the term as in the case cited. My brother CHANNELL held, as I read his judgment, that no request by the defendants to the plaintiffs to pay their lessor the rent in question on their behalf could be implied whereon to maintain the action, and I am of opinion that he was right.

It is clear that no contract or privity of estate exists between the plaintiffs and the defendants, or between the original lessor, Moore, and the defendants; and, unless there be circumstances from which a request to pay can be implied, or, in other words, a contract can be implied between the defendants and the plaintiffs that the defendants would indemnify the plaintiffs if they paid to their landlord the rent accruing while they, the defendants, were in possession, there are no circumstances which will support an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover the amount so paid. It is true that Moore could sue the plaintiffs, his lessees, upon their covenant with him in the lease. It is also true that the plaintiffs, the lessees, could sue their assignee, Price, upon his covenant with them. It is also true that Price could sue the defendants, his under-lessees, upon their covenant with him. But how can the plaintiffs sue the defendants? I omit Price's trustee in bankruptcy, for he, in my opinion, does not affect this case.

It is said that Moule v. Garrett (1) shows that the plaintiffs can sue the defendants to recover what they have been compelled to pay to their lessor, and that this case falls within the principle of that case. What was the case of Moule v. Garrett (1)? It was a case in which there had been two assignments of the term, the defendants being the second assignees thereof. First of all there was, as here, a lease from a lessor to the lessee, Moule, the plaintiff in the action, containing the usual covenants by a lessee. Moule afterwards assigned the term to Bartley, who afterwards assigned the term to the defendants, Garrett & Co., who then committed breaches of covenants in the lease. Moule, having been compelled under his covenant with his lessor to pay to him damages for these breaches committed by the defendants, Garrett & Co., the assignees of Bartley, sued Garrett & Co., to recover the amount so paid by him, Moule, to his lessor. It was held that, inasmuch as both the plaintiff and the defendants were compellable to pay to the original lessor the damages accruing to him from the breaches of covenants by the defendants while assignees of the term, the former by reason of his covenant with the original lessor and the latter by reason of their being assignees of the term and having committed the breaches while assignees, and inasmuch as the plaintiff had been compelled to pay damages to his lessor for these breaches of covenant by the defendants, for which the defendants were also compellable under privity of estate to pay to the lessor, they, the defendants, were liable to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of these payments of which the defendants had had the benefit. For, as WILLES, J., puts it in Roberts v. Crowe (2), the lessee is liable for breaches of covenant committed by the assignee, but being only secondarily liable he has his remedy over against the person primarily liable—that is, the assignee. A B

The ratio decidendi of Moule v. Garrett (1) is this. If A. is compellable to pay B. damages which C. is also compellable to pay B., then A., having been compelled to pay B., can maintain an action against C. for money so paid, for the circumstances raise an implied request by C. to A. to make such payment in his ease. In other words, A. can call upon C. to indemnify him: see the notes to Lampleigh v. C Brathwait (3), 1 Smith, L.C. (9th Edn.), p. 160, and cases there cited. To raise this implied request, both A. and C. must, in my judgment, be compellable to pay B.; otherwise, as it seems to me, the payment by A. to B. so far as regards C. is a voluntary payment, which raises no implication of a request by C. to A. to pay. If COCKBURN, C.J., in his alternative reason in Moule v. Garrett (1) for holding the defendants liable meant this by the expression “by the legal default of another,” I agree; but, if it means by a default for which they were not compellable to pay in that case to the original lessor, I do not agree, and none of the other learned judges who decided that case adopted what COCKBURN, C.J., then said, and, indeed, WILLES, J., expressly points out that the obligation of the contract must be common to the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the whole benefit was taken by the defendants. I D E

In the present case the defendants are under-lessees of an assignee of the term, and are not liable at all to the original lessor for rent whenever it accrued, there being between them and the original lessor neither contract nor privity of estate, and there is no suggestion that there were goods upon the demised premises available for distress other than the goods of the mortgagor Price, even if this would have sufficed to maintain the action, about which I say nothing, for it is not before me. F The above, in my judgment, is what was decided in Moule v. Garrett (1), and the present case, as it appears to me, is an attempt to stretch the decision of that case, and to say that the principle therein laid down applies equally to the case of an under-lessee of an assignee who is not compellable to pay the original lessor as to the case of an assignee who is compellable to pay the original lessor. It will be seen upon looking at Penley v. Watts (4) that PARKE, B., deals with this exact point. He G says (7 M. & W. at p. 608):

“The lessee and his assignee are liable to precisely the same extent, and the assignee is a surety for the lessee, but that is not the case in a sub-lease.”

Again, in Moule v. Garrett (1), in the Exchequer Chamber, when it was suggested that the case of an under-lessee of an assignee and an assignee of an assignee were the same, BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 7 Exch. at p. 102): H

“No, because the under-lessee has never come under any obligation to the lessor, but here the defendant, by taking the same estate which the plaintiff had, has become liable to the same obligation.” I

This is the foundation of the judgment of the Court of Exchequer delivered by CHANNELL, B., and the ground upon which the judgment was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber. The fact that in this case the defendants covenanted with Price, the assignee, that if they, the defendants, became mortgagees in possession they would pay the rent, gives Price a remedy against them subject to any set-off which may exist between him and them, and does not give the present plaintiffs a right of action against them.

A In my judgment, for the reasons above, this action is not maintainable. I agree in the judgment of my brother CHANNELL, and think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

3 RIGBY, L.J.—The only question in this case is as to the liability of the defendants, who are mortgagees by sub-lease of an assignee of a lease originally granted to the plaintiffs, to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of rent recovered by the lessor against them on their covenant in the lease. The mortgagees entered into possession of the leasehold property by virtue of their sub-term in 1890, and the assignee became bankrupt in 1891. Prima facie a sub-lessee of a lessee or assignee of a term comes under no liability to the original lessor either for payment of rent or performance of covenants in the original lease. This is true whether the sub-lease be by way of sale
C or by way of mortgage, and entry into possession of the sub-term does not make the sub-lessee liable to the lessor. But it is said that the present case is distinguishable from the ordinary case by the fact that the mortgagees expressly covenanted with their mortgagor (assignee of the lease) that, if they entered into possession, they would out of the rents and profits received by them (among other things) pay the rent, and that they have been, as they have, in possession during the whole time D during which the rents recovered by the lessor against the plaintiffs, original lessees, have been accruing.

The argument is that they are thus placed in the position of the defendants in Moule v. Garrett (1), who were held liable to repay to the plaintiff money which the latter had been compelled to pay to the original lessors for breach of covenant in the original lease. In that case the plaintiff, like the plaintiffs here, was an original E lessee who had assigned the term before the breach on which he was sued; but the defendants were not, like the defendants here, holders of a sub-term, but were the actual holders at the time of the breach by puisne assignment of the whole of the original term, and in that capacity liable by privity of estate to the original lessors for the very damages which had been recovered by them against the original lessee, F who in the action was seeking to recover them over. Both plaintiff and defendants were under a direct obligation to pay the rent to the lessors; but the defendants reaped all the benefit of the payment. It was treated as plain that as between the plaintiff and the defendants, the liability of the defendants to the original lessors by privity of estate was in the nature of a primary liability, that of the plaintiff by privity of contract being secondary; and on this ground the plaintiff was held G entitled to recover over against the defendants, as though he were in a manner surety for them for payment of their debt.

Here there is no privity either of estate or contract between the defendants and either the original lessor or the plaintiffs in this action, so that there can be nothing analogous to the relation of principal and surety between them. The reasoning in Moule v. Garrett (1), therefore, has no application. If the assignee had been solvent, H the plaintiffs would have had a sufficient remedy in recourse to him. The fact of his having become bankrupt can give no right of action against the defendants on the principle of Moule v. Garrett (1) which did not otherwise exist. The legislature has made provision in the Bankruptcy Acts for the adjustment of rights of bankrupt holders of leases and other parties interested; and it is in bankruptcy, if anywhere, that the plaintiffs must find their remedy.

I VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question raised in this case, namely, whether an under-lessee, who is a mortgagee by way of demise from an assignee of the lessee, and is in possession of the demised lands, can be sued for money paid by the lessee, who has been compelled, according to his covenant, to pay the rent reserved by the principal lease, has not, so far as I know, been directly determined until now. It is plain that, generally speaking, an underlessee, whether holding of the lessor or of the assignee of the lessor, is not under any obligation to indemnify the lessee against the claim of the lessor for the rent reserved by the lease, because the under-lessor generally is presumed to indemnify the under-lessee against the rent payable by the principal lease; see Jones v. Morris (5) and the payment of the rent would not, therefore, be for his relief.

Moule v. Garrett (1) does not determine the question, although it goes far to define the principles upon which the question must be decided. In Moule v. Garrett (1) the defendants were not under-lessees, but assignees of the term, and the ground upon which they were held to be liable was that, the lessee and the defendants both being liable to the lessor upon all the covenants in the lease, which ran with the land, the former by contract and the latter by privity of estate, the defendants, having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee, were liable to recoup to the plaintiff the amount which he had been compelled to pay the lessor for breaches of covenant occurring during the defendants' possession. CHANNELL, B., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the court, says (L.R. 5 Exch. at p. 138):

"It is true that there is no express covenant between the parties, but they are each liable to the lessor for the performance of the covenants. They are each directly liable, and the lessor may sue either at his option, but the assignee having at the time the estate which has been the consideration for the covenants ought, as between himself and the lessee, to perform them."

In Moule v. Garrett (1), in the Exchequer Chamber, BLACKBURN, J., says (41 L.J.Ex. at p. 64):

"I express my entire concurrence in what fell from CHANNELL, B."

WILLES, J., says (ibid.):

"I concur upon the ground that where two parties have become bound, the one by contract and the other by estate, to perform the same covenant, the former is entitled to indemnity against the latter to the extent of his interest, although there is no immediate privity of contract between them; and I think the defendants are liable in this action by reason of their having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee. The principle of the decision in Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7) appears to govern the case."

COCKBURN, C.J., bases his judgment on precisely the same ground, but adds:

"there is another ground upon which the judgment of the court below may be upheld, namely, that the premises, the subject-matter of this lease, being in the possession of the defendants, they were the parties whose duty it was to perform the covenants to be performed upon and in respect of those premises, and whose immediate duty it was to keep those premises in repair. By reason of their default the plaintiff, the original lessee, became liable (although he had parted with the estate) by the terms of his covenant to make good to his lessor the damage which had arisen from the default of the defendants; and I take it to be a general proposition applicable to such a case as this, that, where one man is compelled to pay damages by reason of the default of another, he is entitled to recover compensation from the person through whose default that damage is occasioned. The reason for this rule appears to be well stated in MR. LEAKE'S excellent work on CONTRACTS."

The passage referred to runs thus (1st. Edn.), p. 41):

"Where the plaintiff has been compelled by law to pay, or being compellable by law, has paid money which the defendant was ultimately liable to pay, so that the latter obtains the benefit of the payment by the discharge of his liability, under such circumstances the defendant is held indebted to the plaintiff in the amount."

What (according to the judgments of CHANNELL, B., BLACKBURN, J., and WILLES, J.) were the conditions upon which the liability of the defendants to the plaintiff was based? First, that the plaintiff and defendants were both liable to be sued by the lessor for the same breaches of the same covenant. Secondly, that the defendants had had at the date of those breaches the whole benefit of the land the subject of the lease containing that covenant. These being the conditions upon which the defendants in Moule v. Garrett (1), the sub-assignees of the lease, were held liable, it is necessary to consider whether one finds these conditions in principle present in a case in which lessees, who have been compelled to pay the rent reserved by the lease, are seeking to get recoupment from under-lessees of an assignee of the lease who are in possession as mortgagees. First, as to the common liability of the lessee and under-lessee, they clearly are not both liable to be sued by the lessor for rent. The lessee alone can be sued, and the under-lessee is only liable to the lessor in the sense that the lessor has a remedy in rem by distress on goods on the property demised and by the power of re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of covenant. It is in this sense only that the under-lessee can be said to be liable to the lessor for the rent, and, so far as distress is concerned, his direct liability is limited to cases in which he happens to have goods on the land although he may have an indirect liability to indemnify against distress those who by his licence having goods on the land have been compelled to redeem their goods from distraint.

Is this a common liability within the reason upon which the condition is based? I think it is not. I am now dealing only with the principle upon which the common law liability is based. There is a common law principle of liability, and also a principle of liability in equity, and these two principles differ. The common law principle requires a common liability to be sued for that which the plaintiff had to pay, and an interest of the defendant in the payment in the sense that he gets the benefit of the payment, either entirely, as in the case of the assignee of a lease, or pro tanto, as in the case of a surety who has paid, and has his action for contribution against his co-surety. The principle in equity seems wide enough to include cases in which there is community of interest in the subject-matter to which the burden is attached, which has been enforced against the plaintiff alone, coupled with benefit to the defendant, even though there is no common liability to be sued. In such a case it seems to me a plaintiff may recover in equity, although there is no common liability to be sued.

The two principles are well illustrated by Hunter v. Hunt (6) and the observations of EYRE, C.B., in Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7). The former was a case in which one under-lessee of a separate portion of premises, the whole of which were held under one original lease at an entire rent, who had paid the whole rent under threat of distress, brought an action against an under-lessee to recover from him a proportion of the money which he had so paid as money paid to his use, and it was held that at law he had no right of action. In the latter case, the Lord Chief Baron, in dealing with the principle in equity, takes as an illustration of the equitable principle a series of cases, in some of which the defendant seems to have been under no liability to be sued, but in which the goods of one had been legally taken or sacrificed for the benefit, not of himself alone, but of himself and others, and says, that "the reason is that they are all in equall jure, and, as the law requires equality, they shall equally bear the burden. This is considered as founded in equity. The principle operates more clearly in a court of equity than at law. At law the party is driven to an audita querela or scire facias to defeat the execution and compel execution to be taken against all. There are more cases of contribution in equity than at law."

The audita querela, which is a defendant's writ, and the scire facias both assume a legal liability to judgment or execution in some person other than him against whom judgment has been obtained.

Leigh v. Dickeson (8), in which it was held that one tenant in common of a house who expends money upon repairs of the house has no right of action against his co-tenant in common for contribution in respect of money so expended, is also based upon the consideration that there is no common liability to repair, and seems further to show that in equity as well as at law there must at least be a legal liability on the plaintiff to pay the sum or bear the burden in respect of which he seeks recoupment or contribution from the defendant. This seems to me to account for the common law condition that the defendant cannot be liable to be sued for money paid unless he is personally liable to be sued for the money which the plaintiff claims to have paid to his use. The common law condition may also be explained by reference to the form of action, "money paid to the use of the defendant at his request," for it seems that, unless the defendant is under a personal liability to pay the money which the plaintiff has assumed to pay for him, one cannot imply the authority from the defendant to the plaintiff to make the payment on his behalf. This proposition does not of course extend to cases where the contractual relation of the parties, whether by express contract or by contract to be implied from their dealings with one another, raises a request or authority to pay, but otherwise I believe it of universal application in an action for money paid: see Lewis v. Campbell (9).

For these reasons I think that the right of the lessor to distrain or re-enter does not constitute a liability in the under-lessee to the lessor within the meaning of the condition of the common law principle. But the plaintiff may be entitled to recover within the equitable principle, if he has been compelled to pay or bear the burden, and can establish that the defendant has such an interest or benefit as to make the maxim apply qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus; but, in my judgment, an under-lessee has no such interest in the lease or benefit from the payment of the rent as to make that maxim apply or to bring him within the equitable principle. The equitable principle seems to me based upon natural justice requiring that equity should neutralise inter se the accident that the burden has been borne by one for the benefit of others associated with him in interest, whether such incidence of burden is the result of election of a plaintiff who might have sued all those interested, or whether it is the result of the requirements of the law as to the parties to actions, or whether it is the result of what may be more properly called "accident," like the "jettison" of a part of a cargo severally owned, or the seizure of wines on behalf of the Crown in right of prisage.

In each of these cases the application of the equitable principle depends on community of interest in something in respect of which one has borne a burden for the benefit of another or others. The covenant in accordance with which a lessee pays rent or expends money in repairs is a covenant in a lease in which the under-lessee has no interest. He has no contractual interest, and no estate is vested in him; the only sense in which it can be said that he has an interest in the lease is that the lessee or assignee of the lease who has granted the under-lease cannot defeat his own grant by a collusive surrender of the lease to the original lessor; and it does not seem to me that this fact constitutes such an interest in him that he can within the equitable principle be said to have an interest in the lease containing the covenant under which the lessee is compellable to do the act alleged to have been done for the benefit of the under-lessee. The case of the assignee of a lease on the contrary does show the necessary interest, as is well illustrated in the judgment of POPHAM, C.J., and the whole court, in the Dean and Chapter of Windsor's Case (10), quoted by TINDAL, C.J., in Tremeere v. Morison (11) (1 Bing. N.C. at p. 98),

"that the action of covenant did lie, although the lessee had not covenanted for him and his assigns; for such covenant which extends to the support of the thing demised is quodam-modo, appurtenant to it and goes with it. And in respect the lessee hath taken upon him to bear the charges of the reparations the yearly rent was the less, which goes to the benefit of the assignee, and qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus."

It may be remarked on this passage that the rent payable by the under-lessee has no necessary relation to the rent reserved by the lease.

In conclusion, in my judgment the defendants have not, within either the equitable or the common law principle, such an interest in the lease that it can be said that the payment by the lessees of the rent reserved by the lease was a payment for their benefit or relief, and I do not think that it makes any difference that the under-lease was in fact a mortgage by demise.

The only other question with which I have to deal is the question whether there is anything in the provision in the under-lease or mortgage by demise, for the application of the rents and profits to the payment of the rent reserved by the lease in case the mortgagees go into possession, which will enable the plaintiffs to maintain this action. I think not. It is plain that, apart from the provision for the application of rents and profits, an under-lessee who has bought an interest by way of under-lease from an assignee of the lease by the payment of a lump sum cannot, according to any principle, be called on to pay again for that for which he has already once paid, by indemnifying the lessee against the periodical rent as it accrues from time to time.

So far as the clause for the application of the rents and profits is concerned: first, it is plain that the lessee cannot at law take advantage of a contract to which he is not a party. It may be true that the trustee in Price's bankruptcy, who does not seem to have disclaimed, may be entitled to compel application of the rents, profits, and proceeds to the payment of the paramount rent, as being a fund held by the defendants in trust for that purpose, and the plaintiffs are, I think, entitled to insist upon the trustee in Price's bankruptcy on proper terms taking proceedings to enforce the application of the fund; but I do not think that the lessees can, at all events in this action, as framed and with these parties, enforce that trust. It is not as if the defendant society was in course of liquidation, and the lessees were attempting to carry in a proof to enforce the indemnity due from the estate to their debtor. It is sufficient, however, to say that the judgment of CHANNELL, J., in the action before him was quite right, and that the plaintiffs cannot in it recover any indemnity from the defendants.

With regard to the second ground upon which COCKBURN, C.J., based his judgment in Moule v. Garrett (1), I do not think that it is anything more than a statement of the principle of Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7), which principle is the foundation of all the cases in which the assignee has been held liable to recoup a lessee who has been compelled to pay rent as it were as surety for the assignee. It seems to me that no injustice is done to the plaintiffs by holding that they must fail in this action, for I am of opinion that, if they take proper steps against the trustee in bankruptcy, they can in effect recover this rent from the defendants, provided the state of things is such that the trustee can compel the defendants to apply moneys received to the payment of these rents in arrear; and moreover, as the trustee has not disclaimed, they have, it seems, a remedy against the trustee personally as an assignee of the lease to respect of such moneys as have been carried since the bankruptcy, unless and until the trustee assigns over. I have only to add with regard to Sapsford v. Fletcher (12), Taylor v. Zamira (13), Dawson v. Linton (14), and Exall v. Partridge (15), which were cited to us, that each of these cases turned really on the contractual relations of the parties.

HUNTER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Charity—Charitable bequest—Fund for purchase of advowsons and presentations—No trust imposed as to exercise of right of patronage.

By his will a testator gave so much of his residuary personal estate as should be applicable to charitable purposes to trustees upon trust to invest the same, and “apply the income or any portion of the capital in grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations, or in erecting or contributing to the erection, improvement, or endowment of churches, chapels, or schools, or in paying or contributing to the salaries or income of rectors, vicars, or incumbents, masters, or teachers, but upon the following conditions. . . .” The specified conditions were in effect that no churches, schools, clergy, or teachers should receive any benefit unless they belonged to the Evangelical party in the Church of England. The will contained no trust imposed upon the holders of the advowsons or presentations when purchased.

Held: there being no provision in the will that the advowsons or presentations for or towards the purchase of which grants could be given should be affected by a charitable trust, e.g., a trust imposed on the holders of the advowsons or presentations, when purchased, as to the manner in which the right of patronage was to be exercised, there was apparent no clear intention on the part of the testator that the property should be devoted to charitable purposes, and, therefore, the gift was not a charitable bequest.

By his will, dated May 26, 1877, of which his wife, Sarah Ann Hunter, Albert Gordon Langley and the respondent Francis Jacob Hood were executors, the testator gave all his residue, in the events which happened, to A. G. Langley and F. J. Hood upon trust for conversion and investment as therein mentioned, and upon further trust to pay the income or annual proceeds of one moiety thereof to his sister, Rachel Hunter, during her life, and of the other moiety to his brother-in-law, John Strange Williams, during his life. The will continued :

"And I declare that on the death of each of them my said sister and brother-in-law the moiety in which she or he shall have had a life interest as aforesaid, or so much thereof as shall be legally applicable for charitable purposes, shall be paid or transferred by my general trustees for the time being to special trustees, to be held and applied by them upon the trusts and in manner following (that is to say) :—The special trustees may retain or invest such part of my residuary estate as shall come to or devolve upon them in or upon any stocks, funds, shares, or securities which they may think proper and whether of the class hereinbefore prescribed by me or not, and they may apply the income or any portion of the capital in grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations, or in erecting or contributing to the erection, improvement, or endowment of churches, chapels, or schools, or in paying or contributing to the salaries or income of rectors, vicars, or incumbents, masters, or teachers, but upon the following conditions : (1) That only such churches or chapels shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein the service shall in the opinion of the special trustees be conducted upon pure Protestant and Church of England principles, by which I mean the principles of the Church of England as held and inculcated by those of her divines, clergy, and members who are distinguished as Evangelical and loyal to the work and fruits of the Reformation and as holding doctrines and principles free from all Popish or Roman Catholic tendency and opposed thereto. (2) That only such schools shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein true Protestant and Church of England principles are distinctly taught and inculcated, with preference to those established for children of the poorer classes. (3) That only such masters and teachers receive grants who best show forth by their teaching and example true Protestant and Church of England principles. (4) That no payment shall be made directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of any rector, vicar, or incumbent unless upon condition that he shall, if not prohibited in law, at the principal Sunday morning service in his church, selecting a time and state of weather when the congregation is supposed to be the greatest, read the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England which I recommend that he should make the subject of his discourse from time to time. And upon further condition that he shall on the first Sunday of every month at the chief morning service preach a sermon on 'Love' from a text taken from the Gospel, Epistles, or Revelation of St. John. And I declare that if the special trustees shall find or consider that any rector, vicar, or incumbent, master, or teacher shall preach, teach, publish, inculcate, encourage, adopt, or follow any doctrines or practices which shall be contrary to or at variance with true Protestant and Church of England principles he or she shall be disqualified from receiving any benefit under this my will. And it being my wish that as much as possible of my residuary estate shall be applicable and available for administration by special trustees in manner aforesaid, I declare that all my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the duty on all legacies under this my will or any codicil not payable by the legatees shall be raised and paid out of such parts of my residuary estate as are not legally applicable to charitable purposes to the exoneration of the residue thereof, and that no part of my residuary estate which shall be so legally applicable shall be invested or dealt with so as to make the same inapplicable or unavailable for those purposes."

The testator appointed the Rev. William Carus, the Rev. John Venn, the Rev. Edmund Holland, the Rev. Edward Auriol, and the Rev. William Cadman to be the first special trustees, and the will proceeded :

"If they shall decline to act as such, then special trustees shall be nominated by my general trustees for the time being, who I am sure will select men who may be depended upon to respect and fulfil my wishes. And I declare that on the death of each of them my said sister and brother-in-law so much of the moiety in which she or he shall have had a life interest as aforesaid as shall not be legally applicable to charitable purposes shall be held by my general trustees for the time being upon trust for my nieces Marion Edwards, Eliza Evelyn Edwards, Rachel Edwards, and Mary Ann Cooke, or such of them as shall survive me, in equal shares."

The testator's wife, his sister, Rachel Hunter, and his brother-in-law, J. S. Williams (the tenants for life of the two moieties of his residuary estate), his niece, Marion Edwards, and A. G. Langley all died in the lifetime of the testator. All the first special trustees also pre-deceased the testator, who himself died on July 13, 1896. The will was proved by the surviving executor, the respondent F. J. Hood, and the gross value of the personal estate amounted to £86,541 1s. 4d. On Oct. 31, 1896, the respondent Francis Jacomb Hood issued an originating summons in the Chancery Division asking for the determination by the court of the questions whether the trusts by the will declared and entrusted to special trustees were void or valid as charitable trusts or otherwise, and, if valid, what portions of the testator's

A estate they affected, and also whether the estate or any portion of it was undisposed of and who was entitled to the same, and also whether the plaintiff was entitled to appoint new special trustees of the will. ROMER, J., held that the will did not create a charitable trust, and that there was an intestacy. His judgment was reversed. The next of kin appealed, the Attorney-General and an executor under the will being respondents to the appeal.

C May 18, 1899. The following opinions were read.

D THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case it does not appear to me to be doubtful that ROMER, J., was right in holding that if the first purpose which the testator in this case has described as being a purpose to which some part or all of his residuary estate, according to the discretion of the trustees, may be applied is not “charitable” in the sense in which that word is understood by the Court of Chancery, then the whole gift must fail. It is undoubtedly the law that where a bequest is made for charitable purposes, and also for an indefinite purpose not charitable, and no apportionment is made by the will, so that the whole might be applied for either purpose, the whole bequest is void, and I do not understand any of the judges of the Court of Appeal to question that doctrine. But, in a manner to which I shall refer presently, each of the learned judges gives reasons tending to show that ROMER, J., was wrong in saying that the first purpose in question was not a charitable gift.

E It will hardly be contended that, if the words stood alone, the purchase of advowsons and presentations is a charitable purpose, and it certainly cannot be said that the trustees appointed by the testator might not devote every farthing of the fund in their hands to that one purpose. It is equally clear that he has declared no trust of the advowsons or presentations when purchased. The process of reasoning by which the judges of the Court of Appeal have come to the conclusion that they have the right to read the testator’s will as establishing a charitable trust in the words to which I have referred is this. They say that they are sufficiently satisfied of the testator’s intention by referring to other parts of the will, and I so far agree that, judging of his religious views by what he has said in other parts of his will, I have no doubt whatever that his general intention was to aid the particular school of religious thought in the Church of England to which he was himself attached, but it would be a strange canon of construction for a will to say that wherever you can discover what a testator’s desires and wishes were, although you cannot find express words in the will which give the authority sought for, nevertheless you can supply words, and declare trusts, which are not to be found in the will itself; that, to put it plainly, the testator’s intention is to be judged by the general desire that he has expressed to have his money devoted to such a purpose. To create a trust by such a process of argumentation as that appears to my mind to be not interpreting the will, but making a will for the testator.

H LINDLEY, L.J., says, with the candour which always distinguishes that learned judge:

“I do not say that the words fit it, but you can see plainly enough what the testator is driving at.”

Again he says:

“It is true that he [the testator] has not said in so many words that the part of his residuary estate which may be applied towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations is to be held when obtained upon the particular trusts.”

Again he says :

“ . . . you are to look and see what the drift of the whole thing is and, looking at it from that point of view—although I quite feel it is difficult to fit the words in so as to make them accurately applicable—I think, if you apply the principle of trying to make them fit and then say because they do not fit there is an intestacy, you violate the whole scheme of this testator.”

LOPES, L.J., puts the argument in a more compendious, but, I think, in a more obviously fallacious way, when he says :

“What object could he [the testator] have in view when he directed these special trustees to spend large sums of money in buying advowsons or presentations except to advance religion in that particular form of Protestant religion?”

RIGBY, L.J., says :

“I will take a more general view of it. What did the testator mean? He meant to carry out his object by means of churches, and chapels, and schools. He says churches, chapels, or schools. It is either churches, chapels, or schools, and through the instrumentality of rectors, vicars, and incumbents, and masters or teachers. There and then from that it appears to me plain that he was intending as far as he could to devote his property capable of being applied to charitable purposes for the purpose of religion or education. I do not say that we have got right through, but we are advanced. We find that by means of churches, chapels, or schools, and rectors, incumbents, or teachers he was going to have this money made available.”

I venture to say that if you were to suppose that every one of the words which the learned lord justice has used was in the will itself, it would advance his argument no whit further. The point is this: Whatever his general intention may be, the testator has not done it. I must not omit to notice what LINDLEY, L.J., put as the cardinal and crucial question. Suppose the trustees here had proceeded to appoint a Ritualistic clergyman, would not the court restrain them? I admit that to be a plausible mode of putting the difficulty, but is it in reality anything else than giving a startling illustration of what the consequences would be if the testator, notwithstanding his general intentions, had not made sufficient provision for giving effect to his intentions? Is it any more than again stating the very question which your Lordships have to decide—that which LINDLEY, L.J., has described as the crucial question? Is it not only another mode of putting the point with which he has already dealt, and, I venture to say with all respect to him, not successfully? After all it is only what always happens when the testator forgets to give verbal expression to what may nevertheless be in his mind.

Admitting freely what each of the learned judges has said, I am unable to agree that such general intention, not carried out by appropriate words in the will itself, can give any court the right to place the words there for the testator. That, as I have said, is to make a will, not to interpret the will. You might as well argue that because you can discover that some one man was the object of the testator's affection you should invent a bequest for him, since he did not mean to die intestate, and he must, therefore, have meant to leave something to the object of his affection—that because you find general expressions in a will of affection and regard for certain persons, although there are no words in which provision is made for them, you are to interpret the will in such a way as in a large and general sense may be said to satisfy the wishes of the testator. The plain fact remains in this will that the testator has not declared the trust that the Court of Appeal have imagined for him, and no apt words have been found to fit or give effect to his supposed intention; and I think that your Lordships are not justified in taking such a liberty of interpretation. It certainly would be a strange mode of construing a will, that because you cannot find what else he must have intended to be done with his money, except something of that nature, although it is admitted that there are no words in the will to convey the intention which it is suggested that he had in his mind, you can invent provisions, and impose conditions which the testator himself has not introduced.

With the utmost respect for the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, I say that it would be admitting a latitude of interpretation, and a looseness in the application of words in wills expressing the general intentions of the testator, which, although in this particular case it might do no harm, would let in a mode of interpreting wills which would cast upon the court in almost every case of a defectively made will the necessity of making a will for the testator, not interpreting the words which he has actually used. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed and the judgment of ROMER, J., restored.

LORD WATSON.—I have had an opportunity of considering the terms of the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend LORD DAVEY, and I entirely concur in it.

LORD SHAND.—After very careful consideration, induced by the circumstance that the House is about to reverse the unanimous decision of the Court of Appeal, I agree in thinking that your Lordships should revert to the judgment of ROMER, J. That learned judge has held that while the testator, with reference to the first of the several purposes to which he has authorised the residue of his estate to be applied, has stated that his trustees "may apply the income or any portion of the capital in grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or next presentations," yet there is no provision to be found in his will that the advowsons or presentations so purchased, or for or towards the purchase of which grants shall be given, shall be affected by any charitable trust, or indeed by any definite trust whatever, and I concur in that view.

The testator has authorised his special trustees to apply the income or any portion of the capital of the residue of his estate in three different ways. First, in the purchase of advowsons or presentations; or, secondly, in the erection, improvement, or endowment of churches, chapels, or schools; or, thirdly, in paying or contributing to the salaries or income of rectors, vicars, or incumbents, masters, or teachers. There is no direction to apportion the funds, and apply part to each of these purposes. The trustees might in their discretion apply the whole income or capital to any one of the three, and it follows that, if it be held that one of the purposes is not charitable, the will is not effectual as a charitable bequest of the residue as a whole. I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., that the words "but upon the following conditions," which immediately succeed the enumeration of the three trust purposes, taken grammatically, apply to all that has gone before; but, so reading the will, I can find no condition which has application to advowsons or presentations. These conditions, which make it clear, as regards the second and third trust purposes relating to churches, chapels, or schools, and to rectors, vicars, and teachers, have, by the language used, no application and no relation to advowsons or presentations. It is said in his Lordship's judgment:

"I do not say that the words fit it, but you can see plainly what the testator is driving at."

With the utmost respect for the learned judge, I shall say that that is not enough. I see much in the provisions of the will relating to the endowment of churches or schools, and the contributions to the income of rectors or teachers, which leads me to think that the testator intended to make similar provisions in regard to grants for the purchase of advowsons or presentations, but, assuming that he had that intention, he has, in my opinion, failed to express it, and I say so, of course, taking the will as a whole.

The question is not one for speculative reasoning: "What do you think was the testator's intention?" but "What has he expressly or by implication" (but by necessary implication where implication only is relied on) "expressed by the terms used?" On a sound construction of the will I am of opinion that the testator has not affixed any condition to the application of the residue, or part of it, in the purchase of advowsons or presentations which makes it an application to a charitable purpose, and, as the whole of that residue might thus be applied to a purpose not charitable, I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

LORD DAVEY.—The primary question in this case is the construction of the testator's will. Reading the will shortly, the testator gave his pure personality to special trustees upon trust to invest, and with power to apply the income or any portion of the capital in—(i) grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations; or (ii) in erecting or contributing to the erection, improvement, or endowment of churches, chapels, or schools; or (iii) in paying or contributing to the salaries or income of rectors, vicars, or incumbents, masters, or teachers, but upon certain conditions which I will discuss presently. There is no doubt that the second and third purposes (they are not numbered in the will, but I have numbered them for convenience of reference) are in themselves charitable, assuming that the schools are not schools of a private character, and there is equally little doubt that a trust for making grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations is not in itself a charitable purpose. The learned judges in the Court of Appeal have, however, thought that they could spell out of the words of the will a charitable purpose in connection with the advowsons or presentations expressed with sufficient definiteness for the court to give effect to it.

What one ought to find is some trust imposed upon the holders of the advowson or presentation when purchased as to the manner in which the right of patronage is to be exercised. The mere purchase or contribution to the purchase of the property in an advowson or right of presentation is in truth a mere change of investment, and the charitable purpose must, in my opinion, be found in the use to be made of the property when purchased. I agree with RIGBY, L.J., that we must take the whole will together, and see what, as a fair result, is the meaning of the testator, if by that phrase is understood the meaning of the words he has used. I agree, too, with the lord justice that the circumstance that the testator makes a separation between the portion of his property which he can by law devote to charity and that which he cannot, and that he appoints special trustees to administer the trusts of the former portion of his property, are matters for serious consideration. But I further agree with the lord justice that you are not, because he has done that, to do violence to the language of any part of the will, or to import words which you do not find there to make the purposes charitable because of those prefatory dispositions which the testator has made. You must construe the words of the will fairly, and if you can find a charitable purpose sufficiently clearly expressed the court will give effect to it. If you do not find any such definite expression you are not at liberty to supply it from more or less well-founded speculation of what the testator would probably have wished or intended if his attention had been drawn to the omission. It may be that voluit sed non dixit.

Apart from the expressed conditions, there is nothing except the prefatory disposition already referred to, and the direction to his general trustees, in case the special trustees named decline to act, to nominate persons who may be depended on to respect and fulfil the testator's wishes. There is no suggestion made of any secret trust. These words, therefore, mean his expressed wishes, and do not seem to me to carry the matter any further. I am doubtful whether evidence that the nominated trustees were in fact the then trustees of the well-known Simeon trust is admissible for the purposes of construing the will. It is not pretended that the trusts of the Simeon foundation are imported by implication into the will, and if so I do not see the relevance of the evidence. It shows, indeed, what appears from other parts of the will, that the testator was a man of strong Evangelical principles, but it does not assist the court to arrive at the trusts intended to be imposed upon the advowsons and rights of presentation to be purchased wholly or in part out of the testator's estate : See on this point Doe d. Toone v. Copestake (1).

I turn now to the expressed conditions, and I assume for the purposes of this case that, if applicable to the first purpose, there would be a good charitable trust. The first is that only such churches or chapels shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein the service shall in the opinion of the special trustees, be conducted in the particular manner prescribed. These words, it is admitted, do not in terms fit or apply to the purchase of advowsons. The learned judges have, however, endeavoured to apply the words to the first purpose. LINDLEY, L.J., said :

"I do not say that the words fit it but you can see plainly enough what the testator is driving at. What are these advowsons or presentations to be bought for except for the purpose of advancing religion as he understands it, and he has told you plainly enough how he understands it in the words I have just read?"

With unfeigned respect for his opinion, this seems to me to be making a will for the testator and not interpreting the words which he has used. In no intelligible sense can the purchase of advowsons be called subscribing or contributing to churches or chapels, and to apply these words to the first purpose seems to be doing violence to the language of the will. The words are directly and plainly applicable to the second purpose, and, in my opinion, to that only. The second and third conditions I need not dwell on, because they relate to schools and masters and teachers only. The fourth condition provides that no payment shall be made directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of any rector, vicar, or incumbent except upon certain conditions, and this is followed by a declaration disqualifying any rector, etc., who shall preach or adopt or follow any doctrines or practices at variance with the testator's views of religion as stated. These provisions, again, are directly and properly applicable to the third purpose of the trust, and cannot be made to fit grants for the purchase of advowsons and presentations.

Possibly, if the first purpose were the only purpose of the trust, the court would, however difficult it might be, endeavour to make the conditions fit that purpose. But where you have other purposes to which the conditions, according to the ordinary construction of the words, are properly and directly applicable, it would, in my opinion, be wrong to strain and do violence to the language to make them fit the first purpose. I quite agree that advowsons may be made the subject of charitable trusts, as was decided by KAY, J., in Re St. Stephen, Coleman Street, Re St. Mary the Virgin, Aldermanbury (2). But I am unable to find that the testator has by his will annexed any trust either for a particular charitable purpose or for charitable purposes generally, or, indeed, any trust whatever, to the advowsons or rights of presentaion which he empowers his special trustees to make grants for the purchase of. The Attorney-General pointed out that the advowsons and rights of presentation were not intended to be, or, at any rate, might not be, purchased or held by the trustees themselves. The testator, therefore, has left his special trustees free to make grants to other persons, whether trustees or not, in their discretion, or, if the purchasers be trustees, without any definition or limitation of the trusts upon which such persons are to hold the purchased property. The court is always properly desirous of upholding a testator's will, but, after anxious consideration, I am unable to say that the will discloses any trust as regards the first purpose which the court can either execute or control the execution of by the trustees.

What, then, is the law applicable to the case? There are two classes of authorities. On the one hand, there is a long series of cases extending from Morice v. Bishop of Durham (3), decided by SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., and LORD ELDON, L.C., to Re Macduff (4), decided by the Court of Appeal in 1896, and including two decisions of LORD COTTENHAM. In these cases it has been held that where charitable purposes are mixed up with other purposes of such a shadowy and indefinite nature, that the court cannot execute them (such as "charitable or benevolent," or "charitable or philanthropic," or "charitable or pious" purposes), or where the description includes purposes which may or may not be charitable (such as "undertakings of public utility") and a discretion is vested in the trustees, the whole gift fails for uncertainty. In Vezey v. Jamson (5) the trust was to dispose of the residue in such charitable or public purposes as the laws of the land would admit, or to any persons as the trustees in their discretion should think fit, or as they should think would have been agreeable to him, if living, and as the laws of the land did not prohibit. SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., said (1 Sim. & St. at p. 71):

"The testator has not fixed upon any part of this property a trust for a charitable use, and I cannot, therefore, devote any part of it to charity. . . . The necessary consequence is that the purposes of the trust being so general and undefined that they cannot be executed by this court, they must fail altogether, and the next of kin become entitled to the property."

On the other hand, it has been decided in cases such as Attorney-General v. Doyley (6), and Salisbury v. Denton (7), that where the trustees have a discretion to apportion between charitable objects and definite and ascertainable objects non-charitable the trust does not fail, but in default of apportionment by the trustees the court will divide the fund between the objects charitable and non-charitable equally.

I have come to the conclusion that the present case falls within the first class of cases. AS SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., says, in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (3) (9 Ves. at p. 406):

"The question is not whether [the trustee] may not apply it upon purposes strictly charitable, but whether he is bound so to apply it."

The answer to that question in the present case can only be that there is no such obligation. On the other hand, the other purposes to which conceivably the trustees may apply the whole fund in their discretion are not described with sufficient definiteness for the court to attach any trust upon them.

A third class of cases was relied on by the respondent of which Sinnett v. Herbert (8) and Re Douglas, Obert v. Barrow (9) are examples in which there is a general overriding trust for charitable purposes, but some of the particular purposes to which the fund may be applied are not strictly charitable, or one of two alternative modes of application is invalid in law. In such cases the trust is good, and the court will give effect to the general charitable trust, but the trustees are restricted from applying the fund to the purposes or in the manner which are objectionable. But, in my opinion, those cases have no application to that before your Lordships because, as I have already said, I think that there is not here any general trust for charity binding the whole fund. The result is that, in my opinion, the order of the Court of Appeal should be discharged, and that of ROMER, J., restored, except as relates to costs. The appellants here will have their costs out of the estate, and the Attorney-General no costs. The respondent, the executor, must also have his costs as between solicitor and client out of the estate.

Company—Bonus shares—Shares issued at discount—Liability of holder to pay nominal value in winding-up—Adjustment of shareholders' rights inter se.

Where the creditors of a company had been paid in full and the cost of the liquidation of the company had been provided for out of the assets of the company and the proceeds of calls made on shareholders whose shares had been fully paid-up it was held by the House (LORD HERSCHELL dissenting) that the holder of bonus shares, on which nothing had been paid-up, and shares which had been illegally issued to him at a discount was liable to be called on to pay up to the nominal value of those shares in order to enable the liquidator to adjust the rights as between him and the other shareholders of the company.

Notes. Section 57 of the Companies Act, 1948 (3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452) now provides that it is lawful for a company to issue at a discount shares of a class already issued subject to the provisions in the section relating to the passing of a resolution of the company authorising the issue and its being sanctioned by the court, and the date of the issue of the shares. At the time of the case now reported the issue of shares at a discount was illegal.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming a decision of KEKEWICH, J. G

The appeal raised the question whether, in the course of the winding-up of the Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., Ltd., a call could be made upon the appellant in regard to bonus shares and shares which had been issued at a discount held by him in the company, for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the members of the company inter se.

The House took time for consideration.

April 8, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case a company limited by shares was duly I registered in January, 1880. According to the memorandum of association its capital was to be £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. The memorandum also provided that there should be power to increase that capital and to issue fresh shares. Acting, apparently, on this power, in May and June of the same year the capital was increased to £40,000 and 2,000 additional shares of £5 each issued. One thousand four hundred of these shares were issued on terms which gave rise to the present litigation. Five hundred of these 1,400 shares were issued as fully paid-up without having anything paid upon them at all, and 900 were issued as fully-paid up when only 10s. per share was paid up. The company purported to do this under the terms of an article of association passed contemporaneously with the resolution itself, which provided that the directors might allot or otherwise dispose of the new shares thus created to such persons, upon such terms and conditions, and at such times as the directors thought fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise. In March, 1892, the company was wound-up, and Mr. Welton, who is the holder of a number of shares upon which nothing has been paid, and of shares upon which 10s. only has been paid, has been held liable to pay up the alleged existing liability on both classes of shares, notwithstanding that they were issued to him pursuant to the authority purporting to be given by the fourth article above quoted, either as bonus shares because he subscribed for debentures, or as discount shares whereon 10s. each has been paid.

In respect of the liability to pay up the shares so far as it is necessary to satisfy creditors and the cost of winding-up, I believe no doubt exists in the minds of any of your Lordships. Since Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1) in this House it would be impossible to contend that that question is not covered by authority. But it is said that where the only object in making a call is to settle the rights of the shareholders inter se the law laid down in the Ooregum Case (1) does not conclude the question. I am unable to accede to that view. I think that the legislature, in permitting the existence of a company limited by shares and with limited liability, created a machinery out of which it is impossible by any expedient, either by company or shareholder, to act otherwise than in pursuance of the provisions of the statute. Whether for the purpose of settling the rights inter se, or for the purpose of satisfying creditors, it appears to me that the statute enforces upon company and shareholder alike to conform to the rule laid down, that a share for a fixed amount shall make the person agreeing to take that share liable for that amount. I think that is the decision in the Ooregum Case (1), and though I am aware that a different view has been suggested where the question is not the payment of the debts of the company, but the settlement of the rights of the shareholders inter se, I am unable to see how this artificial creature, limited within its sphere of action by the statute under which it is created, can do anything contrary to the provisions of the statute. It is not a question for what purpose it is done. Dealing with it as I think it must be dealt with, as an artificial creation, it can only act as a company or as shareholder in either of those characters within the letters created by the Act of Parliament.

It is said, and I think justly said, that people have been invited to take shares under an article of association which expressly provided that shares might be issued at a discount. It is, I think, hard for persons who have relied upon that assurance to find out that the article which authorised the issue of the shares at a discount was ultra vires the company because it is in conflict with the memorandum of association which by the statute itself must determine the rights in that respect, but not the less on that account must one insist that the statute must be obeyed. If one were to suppose that the whole 6,000 original shareholders or persons who became shareholders by purchase in the market were to have agreed that these shares should only be regarded as having 10s. due upon them, each of them might perhaps against himself establish some contract by which the person agreeing with him in his individual capacity might have rights, but it would not be in his capacity as shareholder, it would be in his capacity as individual. The liquidator can only recognise shareholders, and their relation to the company of which they are shareholders must be regulated by the Act of Parliament.

The right to have a call made where it is necessary to adjust the rights between the different shareholders themselves appears to me not less imperative than that a call should be made if only the creditors were in question. The supposed bar to such a proceeding is the agreement not to ask more than 10s. per share upon the discount shares, but the whole question goes back to the same point. If the legislature has prohibited it there is no such agreement. The directors have no power to make such an article. The company qua company have no power to agree to such an article, and those who have taken shares and paid for them in pursuance of the Act of Parliament I think have a right to have the shares paid up which the Act of Parliament has enacted shall be liable to that payment. In truth, though in form reserved by the discussion in the Ooregum Case (1), I think that the Ooregum Case (1) does decide the question now in debate, and whether they were bonus shares upon which nothing was paid, or discount shares upon which 10s. only was paid, the holders of those shares are, in my judgment, liable to make good for any company purpose the amount of the money which, upon the face of the share, they undertake to pay. I confess it seem to me, however hardly it may operate upon individuals, to be a just and right thing that those who have completely discharged their statutory obligations should have a right to call upon the other shareholders to do as they have done and pay what is due upon the shares. No question as to the preference shares is really in debate. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—I need not refer in detail to the facts of this appeal, which are fully explained in the opinions which are yet to be read by my noble and learned friends. But I find it necessary to indicate briefly the considerations upon which my decision rests, because I apprehend that they are not altogether the same with the reasons which have influenced some of the noble and learned Lords with whom I agree in the result.

In dealing with the questions which arise for our decision, there appear to me to be two points which must be kept in view. The first of these, which is now beyond the range of controversy, is that the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, as they have already been interpreted by the House, make it unlawful for a company incorporated with limited liability, to issue at a discount any of its shares, whether ordinary or preference. The second point, which has not, in my opinion, been definitely settled by authority, involves the construction of s. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867 [see the Companies Act, 1948, s. 52 (1) (b)]. The decision of the House in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1) carries that construction thus far, that no member of a limited company, who is not protected by a proper contract, duly registered in terms of the clause, can have a good defence against payment of such proportion of the nominal amount of his shares as has not been paid in cash, when payment is required by the liquidator for the purpose of meeting the claims of creditors of the company, or the cost of liquidation.

The appellant is the holder of preference shares, which were issued at a discount, in pursuance of a power reserved to the company by its memorandum of association and of power conferred upon the directors by its articles of association to issue new shares

“to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential or guaranteed or deferred shares,”

“upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto as the directors shall determine, and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends, and in the distribution of the assets of the company, and with a special or without any right of voting.”

I need hardly observe that a power expressed in these wide terms could give the directors no right to issue shares at a discount, a right which would be contrary to statute, even if it were expressly conferred by the memorandum of association. That proposition is not disputed by the appellant, who admits that, if the call which is sought to be enforced in this case had been made upon him by the liquidator for the purpose of paying creditors or cost of liquidation, he would have been liable, notwithstanding the immunity purporting to be attached to the issue of his shares.

A But the call is not made upon him for either of these purposes. The creditors of the company have been paid in full, and the cost of liquidation has been provided for out of the assets of the concern and of calls made upon and responded to by the ordinary shareholders. In these circumstances, the appellant maintains that the condition of immunity from calls, although ineffectual in law to the extent which he concedes, constitutes a contract valid inter socios, and binding upon the company and its ordinary members in all questions between them and the holders of these preference shares. Upon that ground he contends that he is not liable in any contribution in respect of his preference shares, because it is an admitted fact in the case that the sole object of the liquidator, in making a call upon him, is to repay to the ordinary shareholders money which they were under an obligation to pay so as to keep him indemnified. I am not prepared to affirm that the enactments of s. 25 of the Act of 1867, which were certainly intended to give further security on payment to the creditors of the company, were also intended to take away, or even impair, any right to make future arrangements between ordinary and preference shareholders through the medium of the company in regard to the privileges to be borne by preference shares, which could have been lawfully made under the previous Companies Acts. No such arrangement can now be made, or, so far as I am able to judge, could ever have been lawfully made to the effect of relieving preference shareholders of any part of their statutory liabilities to the creditors of the company. The rights and liabilities inter se of the members of different classes of shareholders, in relation to matters which do not concern or affect the interests of creditors, do not appear to me to stand in the same position. I can find no provision in the statute which either expressly or by implication enacts that ordinary shareholders desiring to raise additional capital by the issue of preference shares, may not through the company undertake that the sum required to pay creditors in liquidation and the costs of liquidation shall be charged primarily upon the unpaid capital which they are liable to contribute and that no contributions shall be required from the preference shareholders for the purpose of reimbursing them, or for any other purpose than meeting debts and costs of liquidation.

IF Assuming always that proper means are employed for accomplishing that object, it is, in my opinion, perfectly lawful. It is true that no arrangement can be made which trenches upon the rights conferred by statute upon creditors. But in so far as concerns what may be described as the free assets of the company, meaning by that expression its surplus assets remaining after paying all debts and costs of liquidation, the sole interest is in the members who are the units of the incorporation. It has never, so far as I am aware, been disputed that a condition may be lawfully attached to the issue of preference shares to the effect that, in the event of there being at any time funds available for the declaration of a dividend, these shares shall carry a higher, or it may be a lower dividend than the original shares. And in like manner it is, according to my apprehension, a lawful condition that, in the event of there being surplus assets when the company is wound-up, such surplus shall be apportioned, according to any rule which may be agreed on, among the different classes of shareholders. The truth is, that all these are domestic matters, in which neither creditors nor the outside public have any interest, and with which, in my opinion, it is the policy of the legislature not to interfere.

H I desire to add that, in my judgment, when conditions for which due provision is made in the constitution of the company, are sanctioned by its shareholders, and are inserted in the contract under which a preference shareholder accepts his shares, such conditions, if they be of the character which I have just indicated, will form an integral part of the contract, and be enforceable by the shareholder either against the company or its liquidator. The difficulty which I have felt in the case is one which I casually encountered, without requiring to solve it, in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1). In the present case my difficulty assumes this form—do the three contracts under which the appellant's shares were issued and accepted contain a severable and valid condition that the holders of such shares shall not, in the event of the company going into liquidation, be liable to make any payment for the purpose of equalizing the contribution of ordinary and preference shareholders? In all these cases, the resolution of the shareholders giving authority for the increase of capital, and the issue of shares by the directors in pursuance of such authority are in practically the same terms. The authority given was to issue the shares at a discount; and, although part only of their nominal amount had been paid, they were issued by the directors as fully paid-up. It does not, therefore, admit of doubt, and it is not disputed, that the issue of the shares on these terms, and the resolutions authorising it, were ultra vires of the shareholders, the directors, and the company.

Viewed in its integrity, the condition that partly-paid shares should be issued as fully paid-up was an absolute nullity, and so was the authority given to issue them on these terms. But the appellant argues that the condition, when resolved into its compound elements, must be held to comprise, not a single stipulation, but a whole nest of stipulations, one of which only—that which exempts the shareholder from liability for debts and costs of liquidation—is ultra vires, and, therefore, contrary to law. He, accordingly, maintains that, while the condition must be disregarded in so far as it involves any stipulation which can be shown to be ultra vires, it must be treated as a valid and subsisting contract, protecting him against any and every kind of liability in respect of his shares, from which the company, with the sanction of its members, could have given his exemption in express terms, and by a separate and substantive condition.

I entertain considerable doubts whether, having regard to the terms of the condition, and to the vice by which it is affected, it is capable of being dealt with in the manner proposed by the appellant; but I do not consider it necessary to determine that point. Apart from the rule of ultra vires, it appears to me that the contract is not one which can be so severed into parts. I find it impossible to speculate what form the arrangement might have assumed, if the parties had at the time known and believed that the issue of shares at a discount was contrary to the statute law. The position of the appellant is no doubt a hard one, but it results from the original allottee of his shares having relied on a mistaken view of the law; and I am apprehensive that an attempt to sever the condition in the manner proposed might result in making a contract for the parties which they had not in their contemplation. For these reasons, I concur in the resolution moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD HERSCHELL (read by LORD WATSON).—The questions which arise in this case are of far-reaching importance. They concern not only the parties to this litigation, but the shareholders in many other public companies.

The facts are somewhat complicated, because they relate to three different classes of shares held by the appellant. On Jan. 5, 1886, the Railway Time Tables Publishing Co. was registered as a company, with limited liability. The original capital was £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. All the shares, with the exception of ten issued to the persons signing the memorandum of association, which were paid for in cash, were, under a duly registered agreement, allotted to the vendor to the company or his nominees as the consideration for the transfer of the copyright, goodwill, plant, and stock-in-trade of his business. By a special resolution of the company, confirmed on June 11, 1886, the capital was increased to £40,000 by the creation of 2,000 shares of £5 each. Of these, 600 were issued and paid for in cash, 500 as bonus shares and 900 as discount shares. A second special resolution was confirmed on the same day, substituting new articles for those contained in Table A. To some of these it will be necessary presently to direct particular attention. In July, 1886, the directors determined, for the purpose of raising funds which were required to carry on the affairs of the company, to issue debentures of £10 each, to the amount of £3,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent., and to issue to the subscribers for each of these debentures two fully paid-up shares

A of £5 each. At an extraordinary meeting of the company held on July 29, the action of the directors with reference to the issue of debentures was approved, and they accordingly issued debentures to the extent of £2,500, and two fully paid-up shares to each subscriber of £10. Contracts were entered into as to 490 of the 500 bonus shares providing for their issue as fully paid up, and such contracts were duly filed.

B By a special resolution, confirmed on Nov. 29, 1886, the capital was further increased by £25,000 by the creation of 5,000 additional shares of £5 each. These shares were, in the first instance, offered to the existing shareholders at the price of £1 per share. This proposal not having met with a satisfactory response, they were again offered at the reduced price of 10s. a share, and on those terms not only these 5,000 shares, but also the 900 above mentioned as discount shares, were allotted. By another special resolution of the company, duly confirmed on Feb. 10, 1888, the capital of the company was further increased to £100,000 by the creation of 7,000 additional shares of £5 each, entitled to a preferential dividend of 7 per cent. One thousand six hundred and eighty of these shares were allotted to a Mr. Hoare, who was a creditor of the company in respect of debentures and otherwise; only a portion of these debentures, however, represented a present debt.

D It has, therefore, been held that no more than 1,112 of the shares can be regarded as fully paid, that 567 must be treated as wholly unpaid, and one with £2 10s. paid. At the time when an order was made to wind-up the company, the appellant was the holder of 215 of the bonus shares, as to 205 of which an agreement had been duly filed. He was the holder of 4,460 discount shares, as to 640 of which there were registered contracts. He also held 1,680 of the preference shares. Two calls have been made, amounting together to £2 15s., on the bonus, discount, and preference shares for the purpose of satisfying the liabilities of the company, and of paying the costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the winding-up. As to these calls no question arises. Another call has, however, been sanctioned on these shares of £2 5s., the balance remaining uncalled, to enable the liquidator, by means thereof, to adjust the rights of the contributories inter se—in other words, to provide funds for the purpose of making repayment to the ordinary shareholders.

E Before proceeding to consider what are the rights of the contributories inter se, it will be expedient to call attention to some of the provisions to be found in the memorandum and articles of association. By the former, power was taken to increase the capital, and to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential, or guaranteed, or deferred shares. By art. 4 it was provided that the shares should be under the control of the directors, who might allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons, on such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors thought fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise. By art. 42 new shares were to be issued upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto, as the directors might determine; and in particular such shares might be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and in the distribution of assets by the company. Article 140 is in these terms:

“If the company shall be wound-up, and the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that, as nearly as may be, the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid-up, or which ought to have been paid-up, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding-up. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions.”

I will consider, in the first instance, the case of the shares issued at a discount—that is to say, the £5 shares which were issued as fully paid-up in consideration of the payment of 10s. per share. There can be no doubt after the decision in Oregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1) that the issue of the shares at a discount was so far invalid that it did not prevent the holder of them from being A liable to contribute to the full amount of the shares for the purpose of paying the creditors of the company. Whatever the dicta bearing on the point, that case did not determine the question what was the effect of such an issue as regards the shareholders inter se in the case of a winding-up of the company. The decision was mainly founded on ss. 8 and 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, and on s. 25 of the Act of 1867. A careful consideration of these provisions is essential to a B correct view of the limits of the decision referred to. Section 8 prescribes that, in the case of a company formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares, the memorandum of association shall state, inter alia, the amount of the capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. This fixed amount is by s. 38 to be the limit of his liability in case the company is ordered C to be wound-up. I think it very important to observe that the statement in the memorandum of association just mentioned, as prescribed in s. 8, to which so much weight was attached in the Oreghum Case (1), applies only to companies with limited liability [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 2 (4), s. 212]. By the express terms of s. 10 of the Companies Act, 1862, where a company is formed on the prin- D ciple of having no limit placed on the liability of its members, the memorandum of association need not contain any such statement [Act of 1948, s. 2 (4)].

This appears to me to show that the provision contained in s. 8 (5) was enacted for the purpose of protecting the creditors of a company the liability of the shareholders of which was limited. They were not to be liable beyond the fixed amount stated, but they were to be liable to that amount, and the design was that the E memorandum should give notice to all who trusted the company of the extent of the members' liability. The enactment, in my opinion, does not and was not intended to determine the rights or liabilities of members of the company inter se.
 So far as regards the members of the company inter se, there were no reasons for hampering them in any arrangements they might choose to make as to the interest they should have in the capital or assets of the company, or as to the proportion F in which they should share its profits or discharge its liabilities in the case of a limited than of an unlimited company. Section 38 provides that, in the event of a company being wound-up, every member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for the payment of the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding-up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the G adjustment of the rights of the contributories among themselves, with certain qualifications, of which the following is one :

“(4) In the case of a company limited by shares no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member.” [See now the Act of 1948, s. 212 (1) (d).] H

It is to be observed that, apart from the qualifications, the enacting part of s. 38 applies equally whether the liability of the members is limited or unlimited. What the rights of the contributories among themselves are, for the adjustment of which members are to contribute the sums required, is not determined by any enactment of the Companies Act. It is not provided that, for the purpose of such an adjust- I ment, every member shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company such a sum as will make the payment of each member the same in respect of each share which he holds.

How, then, are the rights of the contributories inter se to be ascertained?
 I reply, from the terms of the articles of association of the company and the acts done by the company, under the powers conferred by them. In the absence of any provision to the contrary, it would, no doubt, be right to assume that every shareholder was intended to contribute an equal sum in respect of his share, and

A calls would be rightly made for the purpose of enforcing this equality. The statute, however, does not provide that the liquidator shall make calls for the purpose of equalising the payments made by the contributories in respect of their shares, but only that he shall make them for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories. What those rights are and what payments must be made to adjust them are left undetermined by the statute. It no more requires that, inter se, every shareholder shall contribute alike to the funds of the company, or share alike in the distribution of its surplus assets, than it does that shareholders who have contributed the same amount to its capital shall take the same share of the profits it earns. In the absence of any provision to the contrary, each shareholder could no doubt claim a share of the profits proportionate to the share in which he had contributed to the capital. But it is, of course, everyday experience that the articles of a company provide for preference shareholders who are to receive a certain payment out of the profits before the other shareholders receive anything.

I think, then, that it is a fallacy to assume that the liquidator may in all cases make calls upon shareholders in order to equalise the payments in respect of all the shares. I can find no warrant for such propositions in the provisions of the statute, and, for the reasons which I have given, it does not seem to me in the least to follow from the circumstance that every shareholder is under the statute liable to pay the amount unpaid on his share. What calls may be made in order to adjust the rights of the contributories inter se is, in my opinion, in no way determined by the decision in the Ooregum Case (1), that the holder of every share in a limited company is liable to pay in cash the amount of his share. It no more determines to what extent this liability may be enforced in a particular case to adjust the rights of contributories than it does to what extent it can be enforced for the purpose of paying the debts of the company and the expenses of the liquidation. In the latter case the amount of calls which can be made, within the limit of liability, depends upon the amount of the debts and expenses, in the former upon the rights of the contributories inter se, whatever they may be. But the liability to pay the amount of the share fixed by the memorandum no more determines what those rights are than it does the amount of the debts and the expenses of the liquidation.

I have already drawn attention to the fact that the provision we are considering applies alike to unlimited and limited companies. How are the rights of the contributories any more determined by the fact that in the latter companies there is liability only to a certain amount than they are in the former case by the fact that the liability is without limit, or why in the one case more than in the other must calls be made, independently of the provisions of the articles, for the purpose of equalising the payment of the members? Section 16 of the Act of 1862 provides that the articles of association, when registered, shall bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had signed his name and affixed his seal thereto, and there were in such articles contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to conform to all the regulations contained in such articles subject to the provisions of this Act [Act of 1948, s. 20 (1)]. The articles thus become in effect a contract under seal by each member of the company and regulate his rights. They cannot, of course, diminish or affect any liability created by the express terms of the statute, but, as I have said, the statute does not purport to settle the rights of the members inter se; it leaves these to be determined by the articles (or the articles and memorandum together) which are the social contract regulating those rights.

I think that it was intended to permit perfect freedom in this respect. It is quite true that the articles constitute a contract between each member and the company, and that there is no contract in terms between the individual members of the company, but the articles do not any the less, in my opinion, regulate their rights inter se. Such rights can only be enforced by or against a member through the company or through the liquidator representing the company: but I think that no member has, as between himself and another member, any right beyond that which the contract with the company gives. It is for this reason that I cannot agree with the view taken by the Court of Appeal in Re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co. (2), which was pointedly put by BOWEN, L.J., that in order to maintain the proposition for which the appellant here contends it is necessary to imply a contract between the individual members apart from the provisions to be found in the articles. Nor can I agree that the contract made by those who take shares issued at a discount is an "illegal" contract, though it is no doubt ineffectual to enable the holder to escape from further calls for all purposes for which by s. 38 of the Act of 1862 contributions may be enforced.

It was not denied by the learned counsel for the respondent that the articles might provide for different classes of shareholders having different rights; that, for example, members might be entitled to a preference in respect of dividend or in the distribution of the assets of the company. I can see nothing in the statute to prevent the articles of a company providing for any such differences in the rights and liabilities of the members, inter se, as may be thought expedient. Indeed, to take an example s. 24 of the Companies Act, 1867, expressly recognises that a company may make arrangements on the issue of shares for a difference between the holders of such shares in the amount of the calls to be paid, and in the time of payment of such calls [Act of 1948, s. 59 (a)]. There is nothing, in my judgment, in s. 25 of the same Act which militates against the views which I have expressed. It provides that every share in a company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued, and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a duly filed contract. I do not question that the shares issued at a discount in the present case must be deemed to have been issued, and to be held on those terms, but this does not determine the amount of contribution which the liquidator is entitled to require from a member. That must be ascertained by inquiring how much beyond what is necessary to pay the debts of the company and the expenses of winding-up is requisite in order to adjust the rights of the members inter se. The argument for the respondent involves the assumption that, after the debts and expenses of winding-up are provided for, every member must be bound in respect of each share he holds to contribute an equal sum to the funds of the company in order to adjust their rights, an assumption for which I can see no warrant in the statute.

I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that there is nothing to prevent a company from providing by its articles that certain members or a certain class of members shall as between themselves and other members be entitled to an equal share in the assets of the company, although they have made smaller payments in respect of their shares, and that they shall not be bound to contribute more than a specified amount, although this may be less than the amount which they are liable to contribute for the purpose of paying the debts of the company and the expenses of winding-up.

The next questions which arise are: Have the company done so in the present case, and how ought the rights of the members among themselves to be adjusted? The articles of the company distinctly authorised the directors to issue the shares at a discount—that is to say, on the terms that, on payment of less than their full amount they should be treated as fully paid up, and they were issued on the terms that the person taking them should not be liable to pay more than 10s. per share in respect of them. At the time when this was done there was judicial authority for the view that this could lawfully be done even to the extent of exonerating the holder from further liability for the purpose of satisfying the debts of the company. There can be no doubt that both those who took the shares and the other members of the company intended and anticipated that no further call should be made upon them. In so far as the claims of creditors are concerned, it has since been held that the provisions of the statute render the attempt thus to limit the liability to something less than the amount of the shares nugatory, even though all the members of the company had expressly determined that this should be done.

A But is there anything to prevent its being binding, so far as the members themselves are concerned? If I am right in thinking that a company might be constituted with articles providing for this result I can see no reason why the article providing for the issue of shares on which no more than a specified sum was to be paid should not be binding in respect of shares issued on those terms upon all members of the company. Why should members, who have become as much bound by the articles as if they had executed them under seal, in accordance with the provisions of which shares have been taken on the terms that no more than 10s. should be paid in respect of them, be allowed to say that, to adjust their rights and to diminish their loss, or even put money in their pockets, further payment should be required? It would be, I think, much more consonant with recognised principles to hold the members bound, and the transaction valid, in so far as the statute does not invalidate it. Any other conclusion would lead, in many cases, to grievous injustice where companies and their members have acted in good faith, but under an erroneous view of the law. In the present case, for example, it may be that the original shares, or some of them, are still held by the vendor to the company to whom they were allotted as fully paid-up, so that a member who has come in when the affairs of the company were desperate would be compelled to find money to provide for a cash payment to the vendor whose business had turned out so unprofitable. Or, again, the shares may have been bought by the present members for 10s. a share, and the contribution of the holder of discount shares might more than recoup this amount.

E If the statute compels such results, we must not shrink from construing it correctly because this construction would lead to injustice. But if, without violating any legal principle, this can be avoided, I think it ought to be done. I may here observe that the clause of the articles which provides for the distribution of the surplus assets, and requires that they shall be distributed so that the losses should be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them was to be "without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions." I do not think that, if the holders of discount shares are right in their present contention, it follows that they would be entitled to be recouped out of the contributions of the other members the sums they have been compelled to pay for the discharge of the debts of the company. It is one thing to say that they are not bound to make a contribution merely for the benefit of other members, that these possess no rights for the adjustment of which this is necessary, and another thing to imply an obligation on the part of the other members to make good any sums which the discount shareholders are under the provisions of the statute, held bound to pay.

I do not feel pressed by the difficulties which it is suggested would flow from such a conclusion. It is a part of the contract that the holder of a discount share should be entitled to participate in the assets of the company equally with the shareholders who have fully paid up their shares or become the holders of fully paid-up shares. No shareholder can be compelled to pay more than the nominal amount of his share. But if at the time of the winding-up there be shares with a liability upon them, I cannot see why this liability should not be enforced to the full before the holders of these shares are entitled to participate equally in the distribution of surplus assets, with those whose shares are, by the contract inter socios, to be treated as fully paid-up. I cannot see that wrong will in any case be done to the shareholders other than the discount shareholders by the conclusion, which I think logically sound. On the contrary, they might in certain cases even obtain an advantage for which they did not bargain.

I have hitherto confined my consideration to the discount shares, but all that I have said is, in my opinion, equally applicable to the bonus shares allotted to the subscribers for debentures. The allotment of such shares was part of the consideration of a loan to the company, without which it would not have been made. Granting that in spite of this the holders are liable to contribute up to the amount of their shares for payment of the debts of the company, why should the other members be able to say that in order to adjust their rights as against these holders they should be compelled to make a further contribution? I do not think that the preference shares issued as part of the consideration for the extinction of a debt of £13,402 can stand on a different footing. The directors had power under art. 4 to issue shares on these terms so far as the members could give it. I think the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In the liquidation of the Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., Ltd., the position of affairs is this: The list of contributories has been settled, and there is no application before the court seeking to have it rectified. By means of calls made in the winding-up all the debts of the company have been paid, and the costs and expenses of the liquidation have been provided for. And now it is proposed to make a further call for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories among themselves.

The original capital of the company was £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. On three occasions additions were made to the capital until, at last, it reached £100,000. All the shares were of the same nominal amount, and all were ordinary shares except those of the last issue, which were intended to carry a preferential dividend. With the exception of ten shares taken by the subscribers to the memorandum of association, the whole of the original capital was issued as fully paid-up under a duly registered contract in consideration of property made over to the company; 600 shares of the second issue were paid-up in cash. The remainder of the capital was dealt with in a less regular manner. To induce persons to take debentures two ordinary shares, nominally paid-up in full, were offered by way of bonus with every £10 debenture. Other shares were issued at a discount of 90 per cent., so that a £5 ordinary share, nominally paid-up in full, was to be had for 10s. Then, in July, 1890, more than a year and a half before the liquidation commenced, a circular was sent by the directors to the holders of discount and bonus shares calling their attention to recent decisions “under which,” it was stated, “it would appear that certain liabilities are in law attached to these shares.” The holders of discount shares were recommended to exchange them for preference shares at the rate of ten discount shares for one preference share; the holders of bonus shares were advised to surrender them to the company.

These suggestions, however, were not adopted by the appellant, who was a large shareholder holding bonus shares and discount shares, as well as preference shares. All his shares were entered on the register as fully paid, and he continued to hold them all until the winding-up. Upon the facts being then investigated he was placed on the list of contributories in respect of 215 bonus shares, as the holder of shares on which nothing had been paid, and in respect of 4,460 discount shares, as the holder of shares on which there remained a liability of £4 10s. per share. There were, besides, 1,680 preference shares standing in his name. The chief clerk certified that they were all fully paid. KEKEWICH, J., however decided that only 1,112 were fully paid, and that of the rest one was paid to the extent of £2 10s., while 567 were wholly unpaid. The appellant, having duly paid the former calls, objects to the call now proposed, on the ground that the shares standing in his name ought, by reason of the terms on which they were issued, to be treated as fully paid-up to the extent not required for the payment of the company's debts and the costs and expenses of liquidation.

Whatever colour there may be for the appellant's contention in regard to his bonus and discount shares, there can be none, as it seems to me, in regard to his preference shares. They were not issued on special terms at all. They were meant to be paid for in full in the ordinary way. But it was held by the learned judge that the consideration for which they were issued could not be treated as payment in cash, and that if it amounted to payment in any other form there was no registered contract to satisfy the requirements of the Act of 1867. As regards the shares

A which the directors purported to issue on special terms, it would perhaps have been more regular, and certainly it would have raised the question more plainly, if, instead of merely resisting the liquidator's summons, the appellant had made a substantive application asking the court to rectify the list of contributories, or to make a declaration in his favour controlling its effect. Anyhow, the burden lies with him. It is for him to show that he has some equity clear enough and strong enough to relieve him from the ordinary consequences of his present position.

B In the present state of things, the application of the liquidator would seem to be a matter of course. It stands unchallenged on the records of the court that some of the contributories have discharged in full their obligation to the company, while others have not done so. Why should not those who have paid more than their proportionate share of the general liability call upon those who are behindhand for contribution? It was said that the statute does not in terms provide that calls are to be made for the purpose of equalising the payments of members. That is quite true. The right to contribution does not depend on statute any more than it depends on contract. It is one of the plainest of equities, and, although no doubt in the case of limited companies where there are successive issues of capital it may sometimes operate unexpectedly, and perhaps even harshly on shareholders who come in at the very last moment, the apparent hardship is really due to their own want of prudence.

D Why, then, I ask, is the appellant to be relieved from the obligation of contributing his proportionate share of the losses of the undertaking? It was said that there was a "social contract" to which effect ought to be given now that the rights of creditors are out of the way. There, as it seems to me, lies the fallacy. How was the supposed contract made? Who gave the requisite authority for making it? Not the company, nor the shareholders, nor any representative body of shareholders. It is beyond the powers of a limited company to limit the liability of shareholders in a manner inconsistent with the conditions of the memorandum of association. The directors, therefore, had no authority from the company to issue shares at a discount, or on any terms relieving the shareholder from liability to pay in full. The shareholders had no power to authorise the directors to do, on behalf of the company, that which the company itself could not authorise them to do. The articles of association no doubt empower the directors to issue shares on such terms as they think fit, but that must mean, of course, on such terms as they think fit consistently with the provisions of the Companies Acts. The articles in express terms purport to authorise the directors to issue shares at a discount. That provision, however, is in contravention of the Companies Act, 1862, and simply void. Neither the company nor the shareholders, even if they had been unanimous, could have empowered the directors to do anything of the kind. If the directors acted without authority, how can their action bind those who are supposed to have given them authority, but, in fact, gave them none?

G The truth is, as it seems to me, that there never was a contract between the company or the shareholders, on the one hand, and the persons to whom these discount shares were offered, on the other. There was an offer by the directors purporting to act on behalf of the company, but it was an offer of that which the company could not give, because the law does not allow it. There was an acceptance by the discount shareholders of that offer. But that offer and acceptance could not constitute a contract. Both parties acted under a misconception of law, and the whole thing was void. The company, however, placed the names of the discount shareholders on the register, and they allowed their names to remain there until their remedy against the company was gone, and now they cannot be heard to say that they were not shareholders.

I Your Lordships were reminded that there was a judicial decision, for several years unreversed, which sanctioned the issue of shares at a discount. That is so. But it must be remembered that, at the time when that decision was pronounced, the current of authority had drifted somewhat away from the true principles of the Act of 1862. As soon as those principles were re-asserted and re-established by your Lordships' House in Trevor v. Whitworth (3) it became clear again—clear, I think, beyond argument—that the shares of a company limited by shares could not be issued at a discount. The issue of shares at a discount is just as much an unauthorised reduction of capital as the purchase by a company of its own shares. And so it was held by the Court of Appeal in Re Almada and Tiritto Co. (4) and afterwards in this House in the Ooregum Case (1). Speaking for myself, I must say I do not think the Ooregum Case (1) laid down any new law. It was no new departure. Your Lordships will find the governing principle stated as plainly and as emphatically in Dent's Case (5) in 1873 by SELBORNE, L.C., as it was by any of the noble and learned Lords who took part in the Ooregum Case (1) in 1892. Holding, as your Lordships afterwards held in the Ooregum Case (1), that the memorandum of association of a limited company has the effect of prescribing as well as limiting the liability of its members, LORD SELBORNE points out, as has been pointed out over and over again, that with certain exceptions, not material for the present purpose, s. 12 of the Act of 1862 forbids any alteration in the conditions contained in the memorandum [cf. Act of 1948, ss. 4, 5, 18, 22, 23, 61, 69 (6), 72, 203, 206, 210 (3)]. His Lordship said (8 Ch. App. at p. 776):

“It is quite certain that, under that clause, if there be found anything in the articles limiting the liability of the shareholders in a way inconsistent with the memorandum—anything tending to reduce the liability of the shareholders thereby prescribed—it is simply void.”

Nothing can be more to the point than that. So far the Ooregum Case (1) goes; but it was not, I think, meant to go further. And, indeed, several of the noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment in that case guarded themselves against being supposed to determine or prejudice the present question. It may be that the principle on which the decisions in Dent's Case (5) and the Ooregum Case (1) proceed leaves little room for the appellant's contention. Still, if it could be shown that the appellant has any equity to be relieved from further liability—if the court could be “satisfied of the justice of the case,” to use the words of the Act of 1862—I do not think the decision in the Ooregum Case (1) would be a fatal bar. Nor, with all deference to the view thrown out by the Court of Appeal in Re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co. (2) would it be a sufficient objection that the contract, if there be a contract, was one with the company and not with the shareholders. If directors, being duly authorised in that behalf, invite persons to take shares on certain terms varying the rights of members inter se, acceptance of the invitation must, I think, establish a contractual relation between the members themselves.

But really all the arguments urged on behalf of the appellant however they may be presented—and they were presented in various ways—must go back to contract as the foundation and starting point. It was said, and said truly, that the directors might have issued shares with a preferential right as regards capital in the event of winding-up, in which case the ordinary shareholders would have had no right to contribution, and then it was urged that to that extent, at any rate, effect should now be given to what was described as the intention of the parties. I could have understood that argument if I could have found a contract. It may well be that one party to a contract cannot escape from his obligations by pleading incapacity to perform them in full if the other party is willing to take something less than that which he bargained for. But if there is no contract, but only an agent acting without authority, I cannot see what equity there is to compel a principal to submit to one set of conditions, because his agent has attempted ineffectually to bind him to another and a different set; nor is the case of the party disappointed by reason of the agent's want of authority bettered by the circumstance that the relief he is seeking is not only different from, but incon-

A sistent with the position he would have occupied if the authority of the agent had been sufficient.

B Some things were introduced into the discussion which are hardly matters of argument. It was said that, if effect were to be given to the view of the Court of Appeal, it would lead to great hardship in many cases. Perhaps it may. There is plenty of hardship in almost every case of winding-up. But I must say I cannot see any particular hardship in the present case. The appellant was warned in time, but he chose to disregard the warning. If a man will remain on dangerous ground after he has been told of the risk, I do not think he has much reason to blame the persons who invited him there, especially when those who gave the invitation did their best to set things right by giving warning in time. Then it was said that some of the members now claiming contributions may have bought their shares in the market for less than the price asked from the discount shareholders. But, surely the owner of a thing, whether he has paid much or little for it, is entitled to all the rights attached to it. It was said, further, that some of the claimants were the very persons who sold to the company the property which has turned out such a disastrous bargain. Can your Lordships go into that matter? There is no evidence that the company gave too much for the property they bought. The failure of the company proves nothing. Is it not enough that the shares were in fact fully paid, and the honesty of the transaction is not impeached?

E These are small matters, and hardly, I think, worth noticing. But the question before the House is very serious and very important. It would be, I think, much to be regretted if your Lordships were compelled to yield to the arguments of the appellant. These companies are the creatures of statute, and by the statute to which they owe their being they must be bound in regard to shareholders as well as in regard to creditors in all matters coming within the conditions of the memorandum of association. Shareholders in these companies require protection just as much as creditors—perhaps even more; shareholders are not partners for all purposes; they have not all the rights of partners, they have practically no voice in the management of the concern. Their security in a great measure depends on the directors adhering to the requirements of the Act. A limited company cannot, in matters within the conditions of its memorandum, go on leading, as it were two lives, one strict and precise and regular, and the other a life of greater freedom and laxity, substituting the easier yoke of "social contract" for the rigour of statutory directions. The confusion would be hopeless. Take the present case as an example. The questions are comparatively simple when you get to a winding-up, but in the meantime, what is the position of a so-called discount shareholder? Can calls be made upon him? If so can calls be made to develop the business or only to meet the demands of creditors? Has he any right of recourse against the other shareholders? Then how about transfer? The directors could not allow these shares to be transferred on a certificate stating that they were fully paid, or they (see Hirsche v. Sims (6)) would be the only persons liable for the breach of trust in issuing them as fully paid. It is not necessary, I think, to pursue this point further. It seems to me that you would be met by practical difficulties at every turn if you were to accede to the view presented by the appellant. I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed.

I LORD MORRIS.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. I see nothing to limit the application of s. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, to the case of a creditor and the company; it applies as much to a shareholder or sets of shareholders and the company. It is general in its terms, applying to all cases of the issue of shares. Any agreement or resolution of the company to issue shares on terms short of full payment was consequently illegal, and the liquidator is bound to bring the appellant's shares to the same level of payment as the other shareholders by making a call for the purpose of such levelling up. This appears to me clear on the statute and to be the principle decided in the Ooregum Case (1). I entirely agree with the full reasons for arriving at this result which my noble and learned friend LORD DAVEY is about to read, and which I have had the advantage of seeing.

LORD DAVEY.—The Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., Ltd., was registered on Jan. 4, 1886, under the Companies Acts, as a company limited by shares. The memorandum of association contains the following clause :

“The capital of the company is £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each, with power to increase the capital, and to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential or guaranteed or deferred shares.”

I do not know what was meant by “guaranteed shares” as distinguished from “preferential,” and no explanation of that term has been offered at the Bar. No articles were registered with the memorandum. The regulations adopted for the conduct of the affairs of the company were, therefore, in the first instance, those contained in Table A. in Schedule 1 to the Companies Act, 1862. All the original shares (except the ten subscribed for in the memorandum) were issued to the vendor as fully paid-up under a registered contract, and it is not disputed that they were rightly so issued. They have been dealt with, and large numbers of them are in the hands of the general public. By a special resolution passed and confirmed on May 25 and June 11, 1886, the capital was increased to £40,000 by the creation of 2,000 additional shares of £5 each. Of these shares 600 were issued and paid-up in cash, 500 were issued as what is called “bonus shares,” and the remaining 900 were issued as what is called “discount shares.” By a second resolution passed and confirmed on the same dates, new articles of association were adopted in the place of Table A.

The material articles, for the present purpose, are those numbered 4, 41, 42, and 140, which are in the following terms :

“4. The shares shall be under the control of the directors, who may allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such person on such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors think fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise. 41. The company may from time to time increase the capital by the creation of new shares of such amount as may be deemed expedient. 42. The new shares shall be issued upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto as the directors shall determine, and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and in the distribution of assets of the company, and with a special or without any, right of voting.”

Article 140 provides for the distribution of surplus assets in course of a winding-up in a manner not apparently differing from the usual way, and concludes with these words: “But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of holders of shares issued upon special conditions.” The bonus shares were issued to subscribers for debentures in the company as fully paid-up, without any consideration in money or money's worth, except the subscription for the debentures. The discount shares, after being offered to the existing shareholders at the price of £1 per £5 share, were issued to Mr. Henry Hoare as fully paid-up, in consideration of the payment of 10s. per share, or, in other words, at a discount of £4 10s. per share. Mr. Welton, the present appellant, is the holder of 215 discount shares, which he acquired for a nominal consideration from Hoare. As to 205 only of these shares, agreements were duly filed in accordance with s. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The appellant has been placed on the list of contributories for the whole of these 215 as wholly unpaid. The appellant is also the holder of 4,460 discount shares, which he also acquired from Hoare for a nominal consideration. As to 460 only of these shares, agreements were filed. The appellant has been placed on the

A list of contributories as the holder of 4,460 shares upon which £4 10s. remains unpaid. There was a further issue of preference shares, some of which were held by the appellant; but as to these the question is a different one, and I will mention it later.

By an extraordinary resolution, dated Mar. 25, 1892, it was resolved that the company be wound-up voluntarily. By an order of April 13, 1892, the voluntary winding-up has been continued, subject to the supervision of the court. The respondent is the present liquidator of the company. Calls have been made in the course of winding-up on the bonus and discount shares, the proceeds of which, it is assumed, are sufficient for the payment of the debts of the company and the costs of winding-up. The liquidator now proposes to call up the balance of £2 5s. per share on the bonus and discount shares, for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories inter se. The appellant disputes the right of the liquidator to make the call for that purpose, and contends that, as between him and the other shareholders, his shares should, by reason of the terms on which the same were issued, be treated as paid-up to the extent not required for payment of debts or costs of winding-up. This contention has been rejected by KEKEWICH, J., and the Court of Appeal following the previous decision of the latter court in Re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co. (2).

The appellant's case was argued with great ability by his leading counsel, and, as presented by him, it had not only an appearance of plausibility, but an attractive air of fairness and good faith. He argued that, as between themselves, the shareholders were bound to give effect to the contract upon which the appellant had become a shareholder, so far as they legally could do so, and, although that contract could not have effect given to it as against creditors, there was no legal principle which should prevent the court from giving effect to it in a question inter socios; and, further, that the rights of the contributories inter se must be determined with reference to that contract. A fuller consideration of the case since the argument has satisfied me that we cannot accede to the appellant's contention consistently with what has been decided by this House in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s Case (1) and the settled principles of law applicable to joint stock companies incorporated with limited liability.

The question now before the House was, it is true, left open in the Ooregum Case (1), but the solution of it seems to me logically and necessarily to follow from what was decided in that case. Let us ask, what is really meant by the issue of a share at a discount. It means that, although less than the nominal amount, or even (as in the case of the bonus shares) nothing whatever, has been paid up on the share, it is to be treated for all purposes of the company, and to be placed on the same footing as regards the rights of the shareholders, as if it had been fully paid-up in cash. The consequence as regards the distribution of surplus assets in case of a winding-up, would seem to be that the discount shareholder would have the right (a) if all the other shares were fully paid-up, to participate in the surplus in proportion to the shares, or (b) if some of the other shares were not fully paid-up to require a call to be made upon them, and to have the proceeds of such call distributed as surplus assets, or (which is the same thing) to have the difference between the amount considered as paid up on the discount shares and the amount actually paid up on the cash shares paid to the discount shareholder before any distribution of the residue of the surplus assets. In the present case the appellant is resisting a call upon him, but the extent to which his argument must necessarily go in other conceivable cases should be considered. If the contract that no call shall be made upon the discount shareholders is valid as against shareholders, although not as against creditors, the result would also seem to be that the discount shareholder would be entitled to be recouped the calls which he had been obliged to pay contrary to the contract out of surplus assets before distribution, and then to participate pari passu in the ultimate residue (if any). If this be not so, the amount of calls which the holders of discount shares have to pay would depend on the promptness with which the liquidator might be able to realise the assets and pay the debts out of them, instead of making a call.

Counsel for the appellant, in answer to a question which I took the liberty to ask, said that the company might make calls on the discount shares while the company was a going concern. But why? If he had had the courage of his argument he would have replied "no," because the creditors have no rights while the company is a going concern, except to sue the company, and the question is then entirely one inter socios. In short, the argument, in my judgment, must be that, except for the purpose of payment of debts and costs on a winding-up, no call can be made upon a discount share beyond the specified amount, and as between themselves the contract is that no calls shall be made on the shares in question.

Let us see what was decided in the Ooregum Case (1), and what was the basis of the decision. It was, in the first place, held in this House that the capital mentioned in the memorandum was intended to be the real capital of the company, i.e., the capital represented by money or money's worth, and not merely the nominal capital for the purpose of fixing the proportionate rights of the members inter se. It was further held that s. 8 of the Companies Act, 1862, requiring the memorandum to contain the amount of the capital divided into shares of a fixed amount, combined with the statutory limitation of liability in s. 38 (a) is equivalent to a statutory requirement that such fixed amount shall be payable in money or money's worth. LORD HALSBURY, L.C., said ([1892] A.C. at p. 133):

"It seems to me that the system thus created, by which the shareholder's liability is to be limited by the amount unpaid upon his share, renders it impossible for the company to depart from that requirement, and by any expedient to arrange with the shareholders that they should not be liable for the amount unpaid on their shares, although the amount of their shares has been in accordance with the Act of Parliament fixed at a certain sum of money."

It is, therefore, in my opinion, conclusively decided that the obligation to contribute to the assets of the company in one way or another the nominal amount of the shares is part of the statutory constitution of every joint stock company limited by shares embodied in its memorandum of association, and, therefore, not alterable by the company or by the unanimous consent of all the shareholders. It is a liability from which the company cannot release or relieve the shareholder. On the one hand, there is the liability to pay; on the other hand there is the correlative right of every shareholder to insist on the due performance of the conditions of the memorandum.

It is familiar law that no article can be valid or binding upon the shareholders, which is in conflict with the memorandum or with the general law. Nor does it admit of doubt that shareholders equally with creditors have the right to invoke the conditions contained in the memorandum and resist any infraction of them; and, in fact, until the winding-up takes place a creditor has no right to do so. That was the principle on which both the cases of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. (7) (8) were decided. Doubts have been entertained as to the correctness of the decision in those cases, and it has been thought that the priority between existing shareholders and the holders of new share capital created under a power is one of those matters of internal management, which, if not expressly settled by the memorandum, may be settled by the articles. Dissent from the decision in the second case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. (8) has been expressed by one of your Lordships in this House and it has recently not been followed in the Court of Appeal: Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. (9). In the present case, however, there is no doubt, after the Ooregum Case (1), that the obligation to pay up the amount of the shares flows from and is part of that which the Act requires to be stated in the memorandum, and the shareholders have a right to the performance of that

A condition. The social contract is to be found not in the articles alone but in the memorandum and articles, and as much in the former document as in the latter.

Therefore, in the ultimate adjustment of their rights inter se which takes place before the final dissolution of the company, regard must be had to the primary obligation of every contributory to contribute the amount of his share to the assets of the company, and, according to the ordinary principle of equity, the contributories have the right to have the adjustment made on the basis that all have satisfied or will satisfy their primary obligation to the company. I do not think that any article or regulation of the company which ignores that primary liability or purports to provide for the adjustment of their rights on any other basis could validly be made, because it would be inconsistent with the memorandum as interpreted by C this House. This opinion, I should observe, is perfectly consistent with a regulation being made for priority to certain shareholders in the distribution of surplus assets when ascertained and got in. But no contributory can take or retain anything out of the surplus assets until he has satisfied his primary obligation either by payment of, or being debited in account with, the amount remaining unpaid on his shares.

D If this be so, there is, in my opinion, an end of the appellant's case, because so much of art. 4 as purported to empower the directors to issue shares at a discount is ultra vires the company altogether and everything purporting to have been done under it is a nullity as against both shareholders and creditors in a winding-up. Article 140 must be read as applying only to special conditions which the company could legally attach to shares. No shareholder can derive any right as against his co-shareholders, or have assets distributed otherwise than in accordance with law, E from an act of the directors or the company which is ultra vires. But it is argued that the company might have done the same thing in another way, e.g., if they had conferred on the bonus and discount shares a preference in distribution of capital which was within their powers. My present impression is, that in the particular circumstances of this case such a provision would probably have worked out the same result, although by a different road, as issuing the shares at a discount but F liable to calls for payment of debts. But I have already shown that in other perfectly conceivable circumstances the result would have been widely different, and the holders of the discount shares (if valid) might be entitled not only to be preferentially recouped out of surplus assets the calls they had paid, but also to participate in any remaining assets on the footing that their shares were paid up in full, or to have calls made upon other shareholders for the purpose of adjusting G their rights, although they had not themselves in fact contributed towards the company's assets.

I cannot, therefore, agree that the company could have done the same thing as issuing the shares at a discount inter socios in another way, and I think they could not. However, the company did not make the contract for attaching a priority to H the shares. What the directors purported to do was to issue these shares free from liability for calls (altogether or beyond 10s. per share), and they no doubt believed they could do so, and intended to do so. It appears to me that it would be contrary to principle and unsound to split up a contract made alio intuitu, and convert it into a very different contract which the parties never thought they were making, because the contract as made cannot be carried into effect, but a similar result might in certain circumstances and to a limited extent be arrived at in a I different way. Such a proceeding would not be giving effect to the contract but making a new contract. Of course, individual shareholders may deal with their own interests by contract in such way as they may think fit. But such contracts, whether made by all or some only of the shareholders, would create personal obligations, or an exceptio personalis against themselves only, and would not become a regulation of the company, or be binding on the transferees of the parties to it, or upon new or non-assenting shareholders. There is no suggestion here of any such private agreement outside the machinery of the Companies Acts. The parties interested in opposing the appellant seem to be the present holders of the original shares and of the new shares issued for cash. They may or may not be the same persons as holders of shares at the time of the issue of the bonus and discount shares. In the view that I take it is not necessary to decide the point; but I am of opinion, having regard to the language of s. 25 of the Act of 1867, that the appellant could not have succeeded according to any view of the law as regards those bonus and discount shares in respect of which no agreements have been filed. There is a third class of shares mentioned in the case as preference shares. These shares were apparently issued as cash shares, and the contest has been whether they were in fact paid up. By an order of June 14, 1893, some of the appellant's preference shares were declared to be fully paid, others wholly unpaid, and one to be paid to the extent of £2 10s. There is no appeal against this order, and I fail to understand what question can now arise respecting these preference shares. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appellant has failed to show any special conditions attached to the issue of any of the three classes of shares held by him of which the court can take cognisance, and the rights and interests of himself and his contributories must be determined and adjusted on the basis that the appellant as well as the other contributories have contributed or will contribute the full amount of their shares to the company's assets. This appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Complaint—Sexual offence—Evidence of consistency of complainants' story, not of commission of offence—Negation of consent to acts complained of—Direction to jury.

On the trial of an indictment for a sexual offence against a female evidence is admissible, not only of the fact that the prosecutrix made a complaint as speedily after the act complained of as could reasonably be expected, but also of the particulars of the complaint so made. This evidence is not to be taken as proof of the acts complained of; it can legitimately be used only (a) to enable the jury to judge for themselves whether the conduct of the prosecutrix was consistent with her testimony on oath regarding the offence, (b) as negating her having consented to the acts complained of and as affirming that those acts were done against her will, and (c) to show that her conduct was what would be expected in a truthful woman in the circumstances detailed by her. It is the duty of the judge to impress on the jury in every case that they are not entitled to make use of the complaint as any evidence whatever of the facts complained of or for any other purpose than those hereinbefore stated.

I Case Stated by HAWKINS, J.

The prisoner was tried at the Nottingham Assizes upon an indictment containing three counts, the first, charging him with an attempt to have carnal knowledge of one Florence Savestre Green, a girl above the age of thirteen and under the age of sixteen years; the second, with an assault upon the same girl with intent to ravish and carnally know her; the third, with an indecent assault upon the same girl. Florence Green was called in support of these charges. She deposed to the acts complained of having been done without her consent. Counsel for the Crown tendered evidence in chief of a complaint made by the girl to her mistress in the absence of the prisoner very shortly after the commission of these acts, and proposed to ask the details of that complaint as made by the girl. Counsel for the prisoner objected to the admission of such evidence. HAWKINS, J., overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, and the girl's mistress then deposed to all the girl had said respecting the prisoner's conduct towards her. The jury found the prisoner Guilty on the first count, and the learned judge sentenced him to one month's imprisonment with hard labour, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question: Was the evidence so admitted rightly admitted? If it was, the conviction was to be affirmed, otherwise it was to be quashed. His Lordship said in the Case: The cases bearing upon this question are all to be found collected in ROSCOE'S CRIMINAL EVIDENCE under the heading "HEARSAY," and in ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING AND EVIDENCE. They are conflicting. I have, therefore, reserved this case for consideration, in the hope that the law may be settled upon a point which is of daily occurrence.

June 16, 1896. The judgment of the court was read by

HAWKINS, J.—The prisoner was tried before me at the Nottingham Assizes upon an indictment containing three counts. The first charged him with an attempt to have carnal knowledge of one Florence Sevestre Green, a girl above the age of thirteen and under the age of sixteen; the second, with an assault on the same girl with intent to ravish her; the third, with an indecent assault also upon the same girl. The girl was examined as a witness in support of these charges, and deposed to the acts she complained of having been committed without her consent. For the Crown evidence was tendered in chief of a complaint made by the girl to her mistress in the absence of the prisoner very shortly after the commission of the acts charged, and it was proposed to ask witness, called for that purpose, to state the details of the complaint in the language used by the girl. Counsel for the prisoner objected, first, that the complaint could not be given in evidence at all; and secondly, that even if the fact of a complaint having been made was admissible, the particulars of it could not be elicited in the examination in chief. I overruled both objections, and the complaint with full particulars was deposed to by the witness. The jury found the prisoner Guilty on the first count only. That, however, does not affect the question we have to decide, because although to establish guilt upon that count it was not essential to prove want of consent, yet as the girl had emphatically stated that whatever was done was against her will, the reasons which, in our opinion, as it will appear, made the complaint evidence upon the second and third counts were equally applicable to the first.

It is necessary in the first place to have a clear understanding as to the principles upon which evidence of such a complaint not on oath, nor made in the presence of the prisoner, nor forming part of the res gestæ can be admitted. It clearly is not admissible as evidence of the facts complained of; those facts must, therefore, be established, if at all, upon oath by the prosecutrix or other credible witness. And, strictly speaking, evidence of them ought to be given before evidence of the complaint is admitted. The complaint can only be used as evidence of the consistency of the conduct of the prosecutrix with the story told by her in the witness box, and as being inconsistent with her consent to that of which she complains.

In every one of the old text-books proof of complaint is treated as a most material element in the establishment of a charge of rape or other kindred charge. In HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN (7th Edn.), bk. 1, c. 41, s. 9, it is said:

"It is a strong but not a conclusive presumption against a woman that she made no complaint in a reasonable time after the fact."

A And in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, vol. 4, c. 15, referring to the time when BRACTON wrote in Henry III's reign, it is said (at p. 211):

B "But in order to prevent malicious accusations it was then the law that the woman should immediately after, dum recens fuerit maleficium, go to the next town and there make discovery to some credible persons of the injury she has suffered."

Later on it is said (ibid. at p. 213):

C "And first the party ravished may give evidence upon oath, and is in law a competent witness, but the credibility of her testimony, and how far forth she is to be believed must be left to the jury upon the circumstances of fact that occur in that testimony. For instance if the witness be of good fame: if she presently discovered the offence, and made search for the offender . . . these and the like are concurring circumstances, which give greater probability to her evidence. But, on the other side, if she be of evil fame, and stand unsupported by others, if she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had opportunity to complain; if the place where the fact was alleged to be committed was where it was possible she might have been heard, and she made no outcry, these and the like circumstances carry a strong, but not conclusive presumption, that her testimony is false and feigned."

D It is too late, therefore, now to make serious objection to the admissibility of evidence of the fact that a complaint was made, provided it was made as speedily after the acts complained of as could reasonably be expected.

E We proceed to consider the second objection, which is that the evidence of complaint should be limited to the fact that a complaint was made without giving any of the particulars of it. No authority binding upon us was cited during the argument, either in support of or against this objection. We must, therefore, determine the matter upon principle. That the general usage has been substantially to limit the evidence of the complaint to proof that the woman made a complaint of something done to her, and that she mentioned in connection with it the name of a particular person, cannot be denied; but it is equally true that judges of great experience have dissented from the limitation; and those who have adopted the usage have ever carefully discussed or satisfactorily expressed the ground upon which their views have been based.

F G R. v. Brasier (1), decided in 1779, is the earliest authority I propose to cite as throwing any valuable light upon the subject. Before that case there existed in the minds of some of the judges an impression that, although a child incapable of understanding the nature and obligation of an oath was not a competent witness, nevertheless, upon a charge of rape or assault with intent to commit that crime, she might and ought to be heard without oath to give the court information; and that upon unsworn information the accused person might be convicted. In R. v. Brasier (1), tried before BULLER, J., that learned judge went still further, and admitted as evidence such information as the testimony of third persons to whom it was first given. There the prisoner was indicted for an assault with intent to commit a rape upon a girl under seven years of age. The girl herself, by reason of her then presumed incompetency to be sworn, was not produced as a witness on the trial; inasmuch, however, as she had on the afternoon of the day on which the outrage was charged to have been committed, immediately on her coming home made a statement to her mother (though not in the presence of the prisoner) of the full particulars of the alleged assault, her mother was allowed to prove this statement, and it was left to the jury as evidence of the facts complained of, and practically upon it the prisoner was convicted. The case was afterwards twice considered by the judges. Upon the first occasion two of them (GOULD and WILLES, JJ.) expressed a view that the girl's statement was admissible as part of the transaction itself. This view was not, however, adopted by the rest of the judges, and on the second occasion they were all unanimously of opinion that no testimony whatever could legally be received except upon oath, and that no evidence on oath of the commission of the crime having been given, the evidence of the girl's statement to her mother ought not to have been received. This case, therefore, in effect, decided that the mere complaint is no evidence of the facts complained of, and that the admissibility of the evidence of the complaint is dependent upon proof of the facts or other legalised testimony. It is obvious, however, that, upon the assumption that the complaint was admissible in evidence, it was, in the case referred to, admitted with all its details.

When and for what reason the proof of the complaint was first limited to answers to such questions as these: "Did she make a complaint?" "Did she mention a name?" "Whose name?", I have not been able to discover. R. v. Clarke (2) is cited in several text-books on criminal evidence as an authority that in proving the complaint the particulars of it cannot be given in evidence, but the ruling of HOLROYD, J., certainly does not go to that extent. That learned judge ruled, indeed, that the fact of the woman having made a complaint was admissible in evidence, as also a description of her state and appearance at the time. But he did not rule that the particulars of such complaint could not be given in evidence. He only ruled, and in our opinion correctly ruled, that they were not evidence of the truth of her complaint or of the statements of fact on which it is based. In this sense the ruling is cited in PHILLIPS ON EVIDENCE (10th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 151, and in this sense we adopt it as settled law. That case is clearly not an authority for the limitation of the evidence of the complaint.

In R. v. Walker (3), on the trial of a person for assaulting a female with intent to commit a rape, PARKE, B., permitted a relative of the woman to whom she had made immediate complaint to give evidence generally that such complaint was made; but refused to allow the witness on examination in chief to state the particulars of it, upon the ground that, according to the usage which had obtained, such particulars should not be given, but that it should be left to the prisoner's counsel to bring the details of the complaint before the jury if he thought fit so to do. It is clear, however, that the learned baron did not approve of that usage, for he prefaced his ruling by saying (2 Mood. & R. at p. 212):

"The sense of the thing certainly is that the jury should, in the first instance, know the nature of the complaint made by the prosecutrix, and all that she then said. But for reasons which I never could understand the usage has obtained."

R. v. Megson, Battye and Ellis (4) was an indictment against the prisoners for a rape on a woman who had since died without having made any admissible depositions which could be laid before the jury. That she had been ravished by somebody was beyond all question. On the part of the prosecution it was sought to put in evidence a detailed account of the transaction in the shape of a complaint by the woman with a view by it alone to show the prisoners to be the guilty persons. ROLFE, B., rejected it, saying (9 C. & P. at p. 422):

"There is a wide difference between receiving such statements as confirmatory of the prosecutrix's credibility in a charge of rape on which she is examined as a witness, and a case like the present, where the complaint made is to be received as independent evidence."

In summing-up he added (ibid.):

"In ordinary cases of rape, when a witness describes the outrage in the witness box, evidence of her complaint soon after the occurrence of the outrage is properly admissible to show her credit and the accuracy of her recollection."

This case is, in our opinion, improperly cited as an authority for excluding the particulars of the complaint. We look upon it only as a ruling that the particulars

A could not be used as independent evidence of the facts alleged to the same effect as was, according to our interpretation, the ruling in R. v. Clarke (2). The last few words of the summing-up rather indicate that ROSE, B.'s, view was that for the purpose of confirmation merely the details ought to be given; how otherwise, one might well ask, could the "woman's credit and the accuracy of her recollection" be tested by it?

B R. v. Guttridge (5) was a very similar case. The prosecutrix was absent when the trial took place. It was sought to put in her complaint made on the following day after the alleged outrage. PARKE, B., thought it safer to reject the evidence on the ground that it was not part of the res gestæ, but only confirmatory evidence which could not be used as the prosecutrix had given no evidence. There is nothing in that case to suggest that the learned baron intended to rule that, if evidence of the complaint were admissible the particulars ought to be excluded.

C In R. v. Osborne (6), on an indictment for rape, the prosecutrix on oath stated that soon after the alleged outrage, and as she was returning home, she made complaint to a Mrs. Partridge, who was called as a witness to confirm her statement. The counsel for the prosecution was allowed to ask: "Did the prosecutrix make any complaint?" to which the answer was "Yes." He was then allowed to ask: "Did she name any particular person?" to which she also said "Yes." It was then proposed by the counsel to ask: "Whose name was mentioned?" To this it was objected that the question was inadmissible upon the ground that, though the fact of the complaint was admissible as showing that the prosecutrix was not an assenting party, the name was an important particular as against the prisoner, and, therefore, could not be asked, and the ruling of PATTERSON, J., in R. v. Wink (7) (hereafter referred to) was cited in support of the objection. In support of the question it was urged that the whole complaint was admissible as part of the res gestæ. CRESSWELL, J., ruled that the statement of the prosecutrix did not form part of the res gestæ (treating R. v. Wink (7) as a direct authority against the question). In the ruling we agree, but if it had been pressed upon that learned judge that the complaint in all its details was nevertheless a fact admissible for the purpose of showing consistency of conduct on the part of the woman, we doubt if he would have rejected the evidence. At all events the case cannot be taken as a ruling upon the point now under discussion, for the decision was founded entirely upon the statements not being part of the res gestæ.

F In support of the view that all the particulars of a complaint are admissible, it was pointed out that the late SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, in his DIGEST OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE (5th Edn.), note to art. 8, says:

"I heard WILLES, J., rule that they were, on several occasions, vouching PARKE, B., as his authority."

H And, after saying BRAMWELL, B., had been in the habit of admitting the whole of the complaint, adds his own view that such practice is certainly in accordance with common sense.

I Two reported cases were brought to our attention in which such view was acted upon. In R. v. Eyre (8), tried before BYLES, J., on a trial for rape the prosecutrix, being examined in chief, was asked whether she had made any complaint, and what she said. To an objection made by the prisoner's counsel, BYLES, J., said (2 F. & F. at p. 79):

"Whatever she said immediately after the occasion, and what was said to her in answer, is equally evidence."

The latter part of this ruling is open to question. In R. v. Wood (9), tried before BRAMWELL, L.J., at Chester, the prosecutrix gave evidence that the prisoner came to a room in an inn where she was barmaid, when she was alone, committed a rape upon her, and then left the house, and that an hour and a half afterwards a customer came in to whom she made a complaint, mentioning the prisoner's name in connection with it; it was proposed for the prosecution to ask her what she said to the customer and his reply. BRAMWELL, L.J., said (14 Cox, C.C. at p. 47):

"I shall admit the conversation; you give evidence of a complaint being made, and use the name of the prisoner, leaving it to the jury to infer that the girl said he had committed the offence we are now trying him for. I do not see why you should not give in evidence all she said when she did so complain, leaving it to the jury to judge of the value of such testimony."

The girl then told in minute detail the particulars of all that had, as she alleged, been done to her by the prisoner and the customer's replies to her story. This customer was also called, and spoke again in detail as to the complaint.

I am not aware of any other cases directly bearing upon the question before us. Many others were cited, all of which we have examined, but finding they were decided upon other principles of the laws of evidence than that which governs the present case, and that they render no assistance to us in our consideration of it, we abstain from any discussion or expression of opinion upon them.

After very careful consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that we are bound by no authority to suppose the existing usage of limiting evidence of the complaint to the bare fact that a complaint was made, and that reason and good sense are against our doing so. The evidence is admissible only upon the ground that it was a complaint of that which is charged against the prisoner, and can be legitimately used only for the purpose of enabling the jury to judge for themselves whether the conduct of the woman was consistent with her testimony on oath, given in the witness box, negating her consent and affirming that the acts complained of were against her will, and in accordance with the conduct they would expect in a truthful woman under the circumstances detailed by her. The jury, and they only, are the persons to be satisfied whether the woman's conduct was so consistent or not. Without proof of her condition, demeanour, and verbal expressions, all of which are of vital importance in the consideration of that question, how is it possible for them satisfactorily to determine it?

Is it to be left to the witness to whom the statement is made to determine and report to the jury whether what the woman said amounted to a real complaint? And are the jury bound to accept the witness' interpretation of her words as binding upon them without having the whole statement before them and without having the power to require it to be disclosed to them, even though they may feel it essential to enable them to form a reliable opinion? For it must be borne in mind that if such evidence is inadmissible when offered by the prosecutrix, the jury cannot alter the rules of evidence and make it admissible by asking for it themselves. In reality affirmative answers to such stereotyped questions as these: "Did the prosecutrix make a complaint" (a very leading question, by the way) "of something done to herself?" "Did she mention a name?", amount to nothing to which any weight ought to be attached—they tend rather to embarrass than assist a thoughtful jury, for they are consistent either with there having been a complaint or no complaint of the prisoner's conduct. To limit the evidence of the complaint to such questions and answers is to ask the jury to draw important inferences from imperfect materials, perfect materials being at hand and in the cognisance of the witness in the box.

In our opinion, nothing ought unnecessarily to be left to speculation or surmise. It has been sometimes urged that to allow the particulars of the complaint would be calculated to prejudice the interests of the accused, and that the jury would be apt to treat the complaint as evidence of the facts complained of. Of course, if it were so left to the jury, they would naturally so treat it. But it never could be legally so left, and we think it is the duty of the judge to impress upon the jury in every case that they are not entitled to make use of the complaint as any evidence whatever of those facts, or for any other purpose than that we have stated.

A With such a direction we think the interest of an innocent accused would be more protected than they are under the present usage. For when the whole statement is laid before the jury, they are less likely to draw wrong and adverse inferences, and may sometimes come to the conclusion that what the woman said amounted to no real complaint of any offence committed by the accused. Moreover, the present usage and consequent uncertainty in practice (for the usage is not universal) provokes many objections to the evidence on the part of the prisoner's counsel, and these are generally looked upon with disfavour by the jury; and the very object of confining the evidence of the complaint to the few stereotyped questions we have referred to is often defeated by a device, not to be encouraged, by which the name of the accused, though carefully concealed as an inadmissible particular of the complaint, is studiously revealed to the jury by some such question and answer as the following: "In consequence of that complaint did you do anything?" "Yes; I went to the house of the prisoner's mother, where he lives, and accused him." This seems to us to be an objectionable mode of introducing evidence indirectly which if tendered directly would be inadmissible. We are aware that PATTESON, J., is reported in R. v. Wink (7) to have suggested that such a mode of obtaining the evidence might be adopted, but we cannot help thinking that there must be some inaccuracy in the report, and the suggestion did not meet with the approval of CRESSWELL, J., in R. v. Osborne (6), nor of BRETT, J., in R. v. Thomas (10), nor can we approve of it.

D In the result, our judgment is that the whole statement of a woman containing her alleged complaint should, so far as it relates to the charge against the accused, be submitted to the jury as a part of the case for the prosecution, and that the evidence in this case was, therefore, properly admitted. The conviction must be affirmed.

G [CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), January 12, 17, February 22, 1899]

I Power of Appointment—Exercise—Special power—Power to appoint life interest to husband—Power validly exercised by will containing gift, bequest and appointment of residue of testatrix' estate to husband.

A testatrix, under her father's will, had power to appoint a life interest in certain funds to her husband. By her will, after giving legacies to persons who were not objects of the power out of her separate estate or any estate of effects over which she had a disposing power, continued: "I give, bequeath, and appoint all the residue of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto my husband . . . absolutely."

Held: on proof that the testatrix' power was only a testamentary power, it had been exercised by the bequest of residue, particularly having regard to the use of the word "appoint" in addition to "give" and "bequeath."

Adjourned Summons to determine whether the testatrix had exercised the special power conferred upon her by her father's will.

Under the will of her father, Henry Milner, Mrs. Bray, the testatrix, had power to appoint a life interest in certain funds to her husband. By her will, dated Nov. 16, 1882, she bequeathed certain pecuniary and specific legacies "out of my separate estate, or out of the estate and effects over which I have any disposing power, all free from legacy duty."

The will then continued :

"I give, bequeath, and appoint all the residue of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto my husband, James Bray, of Ghent, afore-said absolutely, whom I appoint sole executor and trustee of this my will."

A The testatrix died on July 20, 1883, leaving her husband surviving her, and the question was whether by the above bequest she had exercised in his favour the special power conferred by her father's will.

C Feb. 22, 1899. STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—It was stated at the Bar, and I shall assume for the present purpose, until the reverse is proved, that this power is only a testamentary power to which Mrs. Bray was entitled, and as to this circumstance giving force and cogency to the evidence of intention to exercise such power it is sufficient to refer to Pidgely v. Pidgely (2), Banks v. Banks (3), Re Teape's Trusts (4), and Re Swinburne, Swinburne v. Pitt (5). It was contended that evidence of that fact was inadmissible having regard to the decisions in Re Mills, Mills v. Mills (6), Re Williams, Foulkes v. Williams (7), and Re Huddleston, Bruno v. Eyston (8). But all of these are directed to a different point, and they were not intended, so far as I can see, to overrule the series of cases above mentioned, and not one of them is mentioned in this latter series of decisions.

D The rule applicable to cases of this sort is thus stated by PEARSON, J., in Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm (1) (30 Ch.D. at p. 179):

E “The simple question is, whether I can find in the will itself such an indication of an intention to exercise the power as that I ought to hold that the power has been exercised. It is a question of intention, and a question of intention only. There being various indications in the will, some one way and some the other, the question I have to decide as well as I can is, on which side does the balance weigh most strongly? When you have put the one against the other, to which side ought you rather to incline in order to determine what is the real truth of the case with regard to the intention of a man of whose intention you know nothing except what you find in his will?”

F This passage is cited with approval by NORTH, J., in Re Cotton, Wood v. Cotton (9).

In applying a rule of this kind, it is obvious that little assistance is derived from decisions on wills of different form and expression. It may, however, be useful to state that, where a will is found containing a general intention to exercise a disposing power, the court has repeatedly refused to infer a contrary intention from such circumstances as a direction to pay debts or legacies or bequests in favour of persons not objects of the power. On this, in addition to the cases already mentioned, I would refer to Cowr v. Foster (10), Ferrier v. Jay (11), Thornton v. Thornton (12), and Price v. Price (13). Re Cotton (9), which I have just mentioned, is the best case in recent times where a contrary intention has been held sufficiently clear.

I In the present case the circumstances relied on as shewing an intention not to exercise the power are, first, that not one of the legatees is an object of the power, and, secondly, that all that is given to the husband is the residue of the testatrix's estate and effects. Still she does at the commencement of the will indicate an intention to exercise powers vested in her as well as dispose of her own estate, and by the use of the word “appoint” in addition to the words “give” and “bequeath” she seems to me to shew that this intention extended to what she describes as the residue of her estate and effects. On the whole, applying the rule stated as well as I can, I am of opinion that the power has been exercised.

A person who enters an appearance as defendant to an admiralty action commenced in rem becomes personally liable to pay any damages that may be awarded. Even though he has obtained the release of a ship involved in a collision by entering into a bail bond for the agreed value of the ship and its freight, the ship is nevertheless liable to seizure under a writ of fieri facias if the damages awarded exceed the amount of the bail bond.

Notes. The Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 15, provided as follows: "All decrees and orders of the High Court of Admiralty, whereby any sum of money or any costs charges or expenses shall be payable to any person shall have the same effect as judgments in the superior courts of common law, and the persons to whom any such moneys or costs charges or expenses shall be payable shall be deemed judgment creditors and all powers of enforcing judgments possessed by the superior courts of common law, or any judge thereof, with respect to matters depending in the same courts as well against the ships and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment debtor, shall be possessed by the said Court of Admiralty with respect to matters therein depending; and all remedies at common law possessed by judgment creditors shall be in like manner possessed by persons to whom any moneys costs charges or expenses are by such orders or decrees of the said Court of Admiralty directed to be paid."

This section was repealed by the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1881, s. 13, and Schedule, but with the assignment of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty to the High Court, the ordinary remedies for enforcing a judgment in the High Court are applicable to admiralty actions: see 1 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 114-115.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of BUCKNILL, J., dated July 13, 1899, whereby he directed the sheriff to withdraw from possession of the defendants' ship the Gemma which the sheriff had seized under a writ of fieri facias.

B The plaintiffs' ship was in collision with the Gemma, a foreign ship owned by foreigners. Proceedings in rem were thereupon started against the Gemma which was arrested. The defendants entered an appearance and entered into a bail bond for the value of the ship and its freight, thus obtaining the release of the Gemma. The Gemma was later held wholly to blame for the collision, and damages were awarded against the defendants for an amount exceeding the bail. The plaintiffs
C issued a writ of fieri facias and had the Gemma seized by the sheriff at Berwick, where it had put in. On an application by the defendants, BUCKNILL, J., ordered the sheriff to withdraw. The plaintiffs appealed.

Aug. 5, 1899. A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment.—By s. 15 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, it is enacted: [His LORDSHIP read the section, and continued:] The above being the statute, the question is, Can the plaintiffs, who
E have an unsatisfied decree of the Admiralty Court in their favour, by means of a writ of fieri facias directing the sheriff of the county to take the goods of the defendant within his bailiwick, have execution levied under such a writ upon the ship of the defendants, which happens to come and be within the jurisdiction of the sheriff, after the ship had been arrested and released on bail before judgment in an action commenced in the Admiralty Court in rem? It will be noticed that the
F section is in terms general. It enacts that judgment creditors under decree shall have all such powers of enforcing decrees of the Court of Admiralty as are possessed by judgment creditors in the superior courts of common law, and there is no fetter imposed by the section as to taking the ship in execution if the ship seized by the sheriff had heretofore been held to bail and then released in an action in rem.

On Feb. 21, 1898, a collision took place between the plaintiffs' ship, the Kildona,
G and the defendants' ship, the Gemma, which was a foreign ship owned by foreigners. Messrs. Holm and Molzen, the defendants in the action, and proceedings in rem were, therefore, taken by the plaintiffs against the defendants' ship and her freight, and the defendants' ship was arrested by the marshal of the Admiralty Court, it being then within the jurisdiction of that court. The defendants thereupon entered an appearance in the action, in order, I apprehend, to effect the release of the ship.
H and to combat the plaintiffs' allegation that the defendants' ship was in default as regards the collision. On Feb. 24, 1898, the defendants' solicitors, in order to release the ship, undertook to put in bail to the value of the Gemma and her freight, the amount of which was agreed to be £4,875, made up of £4,500 the agreed value of the ship, and £375 the agreed value of the freight. Subsequently a bail bond was entered into, saying by bail, "that if the said defendants, the owners of the Gemma,
I shall not pay what may be adjudged against them in the said action, together with costs, execution may be issued against us, the bail, for a sum not exceeding £4,875.

On April 6, 1898, the statement of claim was delivered by the plaintiffs in the action claiming "judgment against the defendants and their bail for the amount of damages occasioned by the said collision and costs, and for a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount." To this statement of claim the defendants put in a defence traversing the plaintiffs' allegations in their statement of claim, and also containing a counterclaim against them. That the defendants then submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, I cannot doubt, and the issues so raised upon the pleadings by the respective parties were then fought out, with the result that on June 12, 1898, a decree was made pronouncing the Gemma solely to blame for the collision, and further pronouncing "against the defendants' counter-claim," and the learned judge condemned the defendants and their bail in damages and costs, and referred such damages to the registrar and merchants to report the amount thereof. This reference has taken place, and the registrar has reported that the plaintiffs' damages amounted to £5,538 and the costs have been taxed at £441, making £5,980 in all; so that, allowing for the £4,875, for which bail was given, there is still unsatisfied under the decree and payable to the plaintiffs by the defendants the sum of £1,105. I would point out that if the defendants had not appeared, and the proceedings had throughout been solely in rem, the judgment or decree, according to the practice of the Admiralty Court, would have been not, as in the present case, condemning the defendants in damages and costs, but would have condemned the ship alone.

Apart from authority, it appears to me that when a person whose ship has been arrested by the marshal of the Admiralty Court thinks fit to appear and fight out his liability before the court, the forms of proceedings in the Admiralty Court show—and it is not disputed that the forms I have mentioned are those which have been in use, according to the practice of the court from olden times—that the persons appearing as defendants have in the present case become parties to the action, and thereby become personally liable to pay whatever in the result may be decreed against them; and the action, though originally commenced in rem becomes a personal action against the defendants on appearance.

For what purpose does the defendant appear to an action in rem? There are, as it seems to me, three reasons: First, to release the ship so that it may go on trading for the owner; secondly, to test the plaintiffs' allegations that the ship had been in default; and, thirdly, in order to prevent its being sold. The President, in a judgment full of learning and research, in which he has dealt with all the cases from the earliest times, whether in conflict or not, has held in The Dictator (2) that a person appearing in an action in rem becomes personally liable, and considering that no real argument was addressed to us to impeach this judgment, and having considered it and the principles appertaining to the present case, I do not doubt that the President came to the correct conclusion, and I adopt it. I will here use the words of Mr. Barnes—now BARNES, J.—which I find in his argument in The Dictator (2), for in my opinion they express in short and clear language that which I wish to express. He says ([1892] P. at p. 306):

"The plaintiffs have, therefore, a judgment in their favour for this amount, and as the defendants appeared and gave an undertaking equivalent to bail [in the present case they have done far more] they have submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, and have thereby rendered themselves personally liable. The result is that the plaintiffs are in a position to issue execution against the property of the defendants to the extent of the property proceeded against, and under the present practice it is not necessary that a monition to pay should be served upon the defendants before suing out writs of fieri facias."

I asked, during the argument, upon what principle it was that the defendants contended that no fieri facias could be sued out by a judgment creditor against the goods of a judgment debtor under the Act of 1861. I was told that it was upon the ground that it was against good faith to do so when bail had been given for a ship proceeded against in rem. But where is there any bad faith in a judgment creditor attempting to realise the fruits of his judgment from a person who has been condemned to pay the same to him? This I cannot see.

The Christiansborg (1) was cited in support of the proposition that it was against good faith, but that case appears to me to be altogether different. In it the plaintiff had brought an action in rem in Holland and arrested the defendants' ship, and the plaintiffs then allowed the ship to be released on the underwriters of the ship

A guaranteeing to the persons interested 175,000 gulden for compensation, which the ship might eventually have to pay by legal decision in Holland. The ship was then released, and, while the suit was proceeding in Holland, the plaintiffs took second proceedings in rem against the ship here. The majority of the court (BAGGALLAY and FRY, L.JJ., LORD ESHER dissenting) held that bail having been given in Holland in an action in rem, the second action in rem should not be allowed to go on here at the same time; or, if the guarantee given in Holland was not equivalent to bail, but was a private agreement, then the arrest of the ship in England was against good faith as regards the agreement. How does that case apply to the present, where no one is litigating in rem in two courts at the same time, and where no one is proceeding to take the ship in breach of any agreement that, when a decree had been made they would not realise what they were entitled to under it? Where is to be found anywhere in this case any agreement that, if the bail put in to release the ship did not satisfy the damages and costs afterwards to be awarded to the plaintiffs, and after the defendants had unsuccessfully litigated with the plaintiff and put them to the cost of so doing, that the defendants should be released from the payment of that in which they had been condemned? I can find no such agreement.

B This is simply a case of a judgment creditor endeavouring to obtain satisfaction of his judgment by taking, by means of a writ of fieri facias, the goods of his judgment debtor, which in the year 1899 happens to be within the jurisdiction of the sheriff to whom the writ has been directed. There is no bad faith at all, at any rate upon the plaintiffs' part. I need say nothing about the other ship of the defendants, the Wega, for it escaped before the writ of fieri facias could be executed, and it was not disputed at the Bar that had this writ been executed all would have been in order. For these reasons I hold that the sheriff should not have been ordered to withdraw, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

Solicitor—Costs—Agreement—Retention of percentage under verbal agreement out of loans procured by solicitor for client—No bill of costs delivered—Cash accounts rendered debiting client with lump sums retained—Sums described in accounts as “costs as agreed”—Agreed remuneration exceeding scale fees—Delay by client in applying for delivery of bills and taxation—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 73), s. 41—Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict., c. 44), s. 8.

From 1883, when the client had just attained twenty-one, until 1894 a solicitor acted for the client in a variety of matters, in particular assisting the client to borrow money from insurance companies and other reputable associations. It was verbally agreed between the solicitor and client that the solicitor's remuneration would be five per cent. on any loan advanced to the client, and out of the loans from time to time obtained the solicitor retained the sums due to him under the agreement. He did not deliver any bill of costs, but he furnished the client with cash accounts debiting him with the sums retained, which were entered as lump sums and described as "costs as agreed." The accounts were signed by the client as examined and approved by him. The sums retained by the solicitor under the agreement greatly exceeded the scale fees. In 1896, some twelve years after the first account was rendered, the client obtained an order for delivery of bills of costs and for taxation. On appeal by the solicitor,

Held: (i) a solicitor who paid himself by retaining moneys and did not deliver a bill of costs could not treat the retention as payment, delivery of a bill of costs under the order would not convert the retention into payment, and so the accounts were not paid accounts (Hitchcock v. Stretton (1), [1892] 2 Ch. 343, distinguished); (ii) there was no agreement in writing to pay remuneration within the meaning of s. 8 of the Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881 (repealed), since the words on the face of the accounts "costs as agreed" referred to the antecedent verbal agreement and the accounts themselves did not constitute the agreement (Re Frape, Ex parte Perrett (2), [1893] 2 Ch. 284, distinguished); (iii) although there had been delay by the client the order was not unjust, for the solicitor on his own evidence still had in his possession ample material to make out a bill, and, further, the high charges agreed to by the client required investigation; and, therefore, the order was correctly made.

Appeal from an order of CHITTY, J., on a summons taken out by a client, Mr. Buckley, against his solicitor, Mr. Baylis, for delivery of bills of costs and for taxation.

For over ten years, from 1883, when the client was an undergraduate at Oxford, down to 1894, the solicitor acted for him in respect of legal business, more particularly in procuring him money loans; and it was verbally agreed between them that the solicitor's remuneration was not to be according to the scale charges, but by a percentage on the loans procured. The solicitor retained the various sums so due to him out of the loans from time to time advanced, and merely furnished his client with cash accounts, debiting him with the sums in question, which were therein entered in lump sums as "costs," or "costs as agreed," or "legal charges."

A These accounts were signed by the client as "examined and approved." The sums so received by the solicitor were largely in excess of the scale charge to which he would have been entitled, and he alleged as the reason that he had special facilities for obtaining the loans. These were made at a reasonable rate of interest, and no charge of fraud or improper conduct was made against the solicitor; nor, indeed, could any be made. All the payments were made more than twelve months before the summons, the limit fixed for an application to tax after payment, under s. 41 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, [now s. 69 (2) proviso (ii) of the Solicitors Act, 1957].

B The summons was adjourned into court, and came on to be heard before CHITTY, J., in March, 1896, when his Lordship ordered the solicitor to deliver his bill of costs, referred it to the taxing master to tax the bill, and directed that the taxing master should inquire whether any and what special agreement had been entered into between the parties within the Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881, and, if so, whether any and which of such agreements were or were not fair and reasonable.

C The solicitor now appealed. On the appeal four objections to the order for taxation made by CHITTY, J., were made on behalf of the solicitor: (i) that the cash accounts were settled accounts which the court would not order to be reopened; (ii) that they constituted agreements within the Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881; (iii) that the moneys retained by the solicitor would constitute payments as soon as a bill was delivered, so that the order for taxation was premature; and (iv) that relief ought to be refused on the ground of delay.

Scrutton for the solicitor.

Parwell, Q.C., and A. Singleton for the client, were not called on to argue.

E LINDLEY, L.J. In my opinion the order made by CHITTY, J., was perfectly correct. Mr. Baylis ceased to act as Mr. Buckley's solicitor in 1894, and Mr. Buckley has now taken out this summons for delivery of a bill and taxation. It was said, and the statement is perfectly true, that this step would not have been taken but for the unpleasant feeling which existed between Mr. Baylis and Mr. Buckley's father.

F The correspondence shows that these proceedings were the father's doing. But it is not a case of the father using the name of the son in any proceedings, but he urged his son to take proceedings. The true inference is that, although the father has prompted the proceedings, they are really the proceedings of the son. Whether they were instigated by the father or not is immaterial, for they are bona fide the litigation of the son.

G The present appeal is by Mr. Baylis in order to show why no bill should be delivered, or at all events that no order to tax should be made, even guarded as this order was by CHITTY, J. Several points are made on his behalf. The first point made is, that these are settled accounts and have been paid. We may treat them as one, because, though separate in one sense, the answer to one is the answer to the others. We cannot hold that these were settled accounts or paid accounts,

H inasmuch as there never has been any delivery of any bill of costs of any sort or kind. Counsel for the solicitor has urged that they will be paid accounts when the bill is delivered under the order of the court, because the payments will then be held to refer to the bill, and that, therefore, it is premature to order taxation. I cannot follow that argument. There is no bill now before the court, there is no bill to which these payments can be referred. This is not like Hitchcock v. Stretton (1),

I in which I think that perhaps STIRLING, J., went a little too far in holding that on delivery of a bill of costs after the issue of the writ in the action payments made before the proceedings could be referred to it. I cannot help thinking that the real reason why STIRLING, J., decided in this way was that when he came to see the bill of costs he could not find that there was anything at all which required taxation. I am quite satisfied that, if he had thought these were improper payments, he would have ordered taxation. As a matter of law, I repeat, I think that he went a little too far, though I do not say that the decision was wrong, but I feel convinced that this explanation of his reason is the true one. It is said that, having regard to

Ex parte Hemming (3), we ought to stay our hands in this case; but that is an impossible contention, and the same observation applies to Re Thompson, Ex parte Baylis (4), where the court came to the conclusion that the payment could be referred to the bill of costs because the client had actually had the bill and had been satisfied with it. Here we can exercise no judgment of that kind, because we have no materials to enable us to do so. The authorities only show that a solicitor who pays himself by retaining, and does not deliver a bill of costs, cannot treat that retention as payment. No authority to the contrary has been cited, and I cannot see that there has been here payment or settled account.

The other point is different. It is said that it was wrong to order taxation because these accounts were written agreements within s. 8 of the Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881. If there had been any agreement in writing within the Act we should have to pay attention to it. If the circumstances are looked at it is clear what the agreement was, viz., that the real agreement was a verbal agreement with this young man that Mr. Baylis should pay himself his costs in this way. Having our attention called to that, I am not prepared to construe the words as we construed those in Re Frape, Ex parte Perrett (2). In this case we are told that the agreement was only for "costs as agreed." That expression does not look as if this document was the written agreement, but rather as if it referred to some other agreement. The account refers to some antecedent agreement not embodied in that account, so that the decision in Re Frape (2) does not cover this case at all. I think that decision was quite right, and I will not throw any doubt upon it; but to extend that decision to a case where there is no agreement in writing would be a very different matter.

The delay which has taken place is a further and a serious point. If by ordering taxation we should be doing an injustice to Mr. Baylis, or if, owing to lapse of time, he had lost the materials for preparing his bill and could not comply with the order, it would be different; but on his own evidence he has in his possession ample materials for making it out, and there is nothing to show that we should be doing any injustice in ordering him to do so. I have only one other word to say. When you look at these charges they are very large sums; I do not say they are overcharges, but the difference between them and the scale fees is shown by the evidence, and they are much larger than the usual charges made by solicitors. That requires investigation, and was quite enough to justify CHITTY, J., and this court in making the order which has been made. That order is guarded in the manner which I have pointed out, and was quite right, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that the order made by CHITTY, J., is perfectly right in the circumstances of this case. It is said that one reason why it is not right is that there has been delay. It is perfectly true that there has been delay. Mr. Buckley attained his majority in 1882, and twelve years elapsed during which Mr. Baylis acted for him without any question being raised. No doubt that is a long delay, and if it had not appeared from the evidence that Mr. Baylis was in a position to prepare a bill of costs, if he had not got the materials before him from which he would be able to prepare his bill, that would have great weight. But he has the materials, and I have even some doubt whether he has not got the bill itself ready. That is the answer to the plea of delay. But there is another answer. I cannot help thinking that there is ground for saying that the agreement relied upon is somewhat unreasonable, because it does appear that there is a very large excess in the amounts charged compared with what would be chargeable under the scale, and that is a strong argument in favour of the order made by CHITTY, J., and one which tells against the suggestion that the order is wrong because of delay.

Then it is said that there has been payment and a settlement of account; but, in my opinion, there has been neither payment nor settlement. No bill of costs has ever been delivered. It is said that the solicitor has retained the money himself,

A and that that amounts to payment. It is not said that if no bill had been delivered that would be payment; but that, when under the order the bill is delivered, if it contains anything to which the previous retention can refer, that will convert the retention into payment. That seems to be a preposterous contention. There is no doubt a case of Hitchcock v. Stretton (1), in which it was held that retention could be referred to a bill delivered after the issue of the writ; but that was a different case.

B And the reason why STIRLING, J., acted as he did was, because he felt that under the circumstances there was nothing wrong, but that all was fair and right, and that to send the bill for taxation would have been a useless proceeding.

The further point taken is under the Act of 1881, s. 8. [His LORDSHIP read the section, and continued:] The question is, whether in this case there was any such agreement in writing as is contemplated by that enactment. The expressions used in the accounts are "costs" and "costs as agreed." In my opinion that is not a compliance with the statute, and I cannot help thinking (speaking for myself) that the terms of the agreement ought to be found in the writing, and that that is what the statute intended. It is not necessary to go that length for the purpose of this case. Upon "costs" and "costs as agreed," taken by themselves, it is impossible to come to any conclusion what the agreement may be; but we are relieved from the difficulty which might have arisen, because we were told by the solicitor's counsel what the real agreement was, viz., that there was to be an allowance of 5 per cent. on loans procured by Mr. Baylis. That was an oral agreement, and how can it be said that these words "costs" and "costs as agreed" in any way indicate what the real agreement was? That point also fails, and in my opinion the order made by CHITTY, J., was in every respect right.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I will add a few words, because this is a matter which involves principles of great importance. In every case of an agreement between a solicitor and client the court has always recognised that a solicitor can exercise great influence over his client, and it looks upon an agreement prepared by the solicitor with great jealousy and care, and throws upon the solicitor the burden of showing that it was fair and proper. The Act of 1881 did not alter that, but recognised it in the plainest possible terms. Where there is an agreement the court can refer that to the taxing master to ascertain whether it is fair and reasonable, and if not it is not to be treated as binding upon the client.

Is there here, in the first place, an agreement binding under the Act of 1881? The only thing in writing and signed, which is what the Act requires, is a statement which in the first account is in these words, "costs of mortgage as agreed, £35." In some of the later ones it is, "costs as agreed," and so on. The solicitor's counsel argued that there you have on the face of the document an agreement that that is to be the amount of the costs. But he began by saying that there was a verbal agreement with this young man just after he attained twenty-one, to the effect that when any money was borrowed the solicitor should be paid 5 per cent. on the gross amount to cover his costs and commission. That was the agreement on their part. Although it may have been difficult for the other side to set up that case it is different when the solicitor tells us so himself, and it is quite plain that these documents refer to that agreement. They are not in themselves the agreement, but they refer to an antecedent agreement to pay 5 per cent. for commission and costs, and the words "costs of mortgage as agreed" are completely explained. This was not a written agreement at all; it was a verbal agreement, and not in writing, and ought not to be binding on the client.

It was said that that was not consistent with the decision in Re Frape (2), but I think it is consistent with it. It was a strong decision. I was a party to it. But it does not go so far as we are asked to go in this case. The question there was this: In an account which had been signed by the client there was an item for "agreed costs £80." That document enabled the court to say that it was a sufficient description of all the costs incurred down to the date of that document (and there was no suggestion of any agreement outside that document), and that the agreement was that £80 should be the amount payable for all these costs. That is quite different from the point now before us. This is not on the face of the document an agreement, but a reference to an antecedent verbal agreement which is not binding on the client. That completely distinguishes this case from Re Frape (2). This verbal agreement was entered into with Mr. Buckley when he was just of age. The court will look very carefully at an agreement even if it has been signed, but the true result of this is that there was no agreement. There is not enough to satisfy the Act of 1881, and we must treat it as if there was no signed agreement. If we had to look into it further I should say that the agreement, whether written or not, requires most careful investigation, because the first account does not refer to any agreement. It says, "costs as to loan, £30." That was a loan of £600 made by one of the leading insurance societies in London. The account is made out by the society, and refers to costs of investigation of title. Therefore, the investigation was not made by Mr. Baylis, but by the solicitors of the society. On looking at the scale it appears that the only charge Mr. Baylis could have made was 1 per cent., which would have amounted to £6; instead of which he has charged £30. That seems to me to be an exorbitant charge, which would quite justify the court in inquiring whether it was a fair and reasonable agreement.

Then it was said that there had been payment of these accounts. I asked whether there had ever been a case in which retention had been held to be payment where no bill of costs had been delivered, and here no bill has been delivered up to this moment. The answer was "no"; but that there are cases where a bill has been delivered after the retention, and has been kept for some time without objection, and the retention has been held to refer to that bill and treated as payment. Other cases are said to have gone further than that. As for instance Hitchcock v. Stretton (1), before STIRLING, J., where after the action had begun the bill was for the first time delivered, and the learned judge thought himself bound to treat that as referable to the retention which had been made before any proceedings had been commenced, or any bill delivered. With great deference to STIRLING, J., I should not have so decided. I do not think that anything warrants us in going that step further than we did in Re Frape (2). We are asked to go even further than the decision in Hitchcock v. Stretton (1), and to hold that a bill delivered under the order of the court will relate back and make all these retentions payments. Even if Hitchcock v. Stretton (1) was right, this would be to carry it a great deal further. I entirely dissent from the argument that delivery of a bill under this order would make that payment which is not payment now. I cannot follow that argument.

Then it is said that this is a settled account; but the same answer as is given to the suggestion of an agreement is conclusive. There is one item which the client has had no opportunity of investigating. He has not agreed in any way binding on him to make a payment of that item, and no bill has been delivered, and it cannot be treated as a settled account. It is urged that the respondent is coming a long time after the event. There is no Statute of Limitations which applies, and the Act of 1881 says not a word as to the time within which a bill must be delivered, so there is no statutory bar. But still there has been a long delay. The first account was in 1885, and we are now in 1896. If it could be added to that that the solicitor is in a great difficulty, that he has lost his vouchers and cannot make out a bill, there would be great force in the argument; but we have it that he has the materials, and that his clerk has actually made out a draft bill, so there is no difficulty of that kind. This is a matter between solicitor and client, and of a client very much in the hands of the solicitor, and I do not feel disposed to say that the question of delay is enough to make the order of CHITTY, J., improper. I also think that the father's action was quite right, although the son is perhaps doing what he would not have done without it. [His LORDSHIP referred to the order, and continued:] If the taxing master finds that there has been an agreement which is binding under the Act of 1881, he will tax the bill in relation to that agreement, but he cannot tell until he sees the bill whether the agreement is reasonable or not. Seeing that the solicitor has all the materials, it is rather extraordinary that he should attempt to interfere with an order which is reasonable, right, and proper. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Sewer—Drain—Connection with public sewer—Right of owners and occupiers to connect with public sewer—Limitation of powers of sanitary authority to prescribing mode of connection—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55), ss. 21, 299.

The plaintiff was the owner of low-lying land known as Dunstable Park on to which ancient sewers had for many years conveyed not only surface water but also foul matter coming from house drains. Sewage matter did not find its way into the sewers to any great extent until after the year 1873. After a number of alterations had been made to the construction of the sewers most of the sewage matter drained on Dunstable Park, where, by the time this action was brought, it had formed a pond several acres in extent. The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the urban sanitary authority, from discharging or permitting the discharge of sewage on his land. The defendants pleaded a lost grant, acquiescence by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title, and that householders had acquired prescriptive rights to use the sewers.

Held: (i) the evidence fell far short of what was requisite to raise the presumption of a lost grant, and so the defendants had no prescriptive right to drain sewage on to the plaintiff's land, and an injunction would be granted to restrain them from directing or authorising any sewage or foul matter to flow or to be discharged from sewers or drains vested in them into the park; but (ii) under s. 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, owners and occupiers had an absolute right to drain into an existing sewer, the powers of the urban sanitary authority being limited under that section to prescribing the manner of connection to the sewer, and, therefore, an injunction could not be granted which would prohibit the defendants from permitting or allowing fresh connections to be made.

Action by the plaintiffs, the freeholder and his tenant of lands known as "Dunstable Park," against the defendants, the corporation of Dunstable, as the urban sanitary authority of the district, to restrain them from discharging, or allowing to be discharged or to flow on to the said lands, any water, sewage, or other foul or noxious matter, and from allowing any such matter to be discharged from sewers or drains belonging to the defendants on to the said lands. The freeholder only is referred to as plaintiff in future. G

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment. Dunstable is an ancient town. Two Roman roads, namely, Watling Street and Icknield Way, crossed each other at this point. It was nothing more than an ordinary parish until 1863, when a local board of health was formed, and in 1864 for the first time it was incorporated as a municipal borough. There are along Watling Street, which is now High Street, sewers of great age. Through these sewers surface water from the streets has, as far as living memory goes, flowed in three directions, part through H

A the drain or pipe under what is known as Perkin's House, in High Street, and thence into a pond in the park, the overflow of which goes to a low-lying piece of land near the railway embankment. Another part crosses Icknield Way, now known as Church Street, and then enters land not belonging to the plaintiff, but this also ultimately finds its way into the low land near the railway embankment. The third part went, until recently, in a comparatively short sewer in the High Street towards the north, outside the boundary of the parish, to a field formerly belonging to the plaintiff, known as the Dog Kennel Close. It has been proved that these ancient sewers have for many years conveyed not only surface water but also slops and foul matter coming from house drains, the consequence of which was that the open ditches or receptacles in Dunstable Park and in the Dog Kennel Close became from time to time offensive. It was proved that, as far back as 1869, no less than 610 houses were connected with the sewers. With reference to sewage matter other than slops and house drainage, it was not satisfactorily shown that it found its way into the sewers to any considerable extent until after the year 1873, when for the first time a water company supplied the town with water, but probably there were a few water closets prior to that date which were flushed by means of rain water cisterns, and there may have been a few privies the contents of which found their way into one or other of the sewers. But, speaking generally, the ordinary mode of dealing with sewage of this nature was by cesspools which were periodically emptied.

In 1887 part of the Dog Kennel Close was sold by the plaintiff, and the pond into which the overflow from the third sewer above mentioned used to pass was filled up. Two dome wells were constructed nearer the road in order to receive and retain the sewage and other matter which formerly went into the pond, and the plaintiff covenanted with the purchaser, in effect, to prevent any sewage matter from coming on to the land. In 1890 the plaintiff sold the rest of the Dog Kennel Close, including the two dome wells. These soon proved a nuisance, and the defendants, with a view to remedying this nuisance reversed the gradient of this third sewer so that the fall was toward the south instead of towards the north, and the contents of this sewer, which formerly discharged into the Dog Kennel Close, thenceforward passed under Perkin's House into Dunstable Park. At the present time there is a foul pond of several acres in extent in Dunstable Park, and it is of this that the plaintiff complains. The surface is so clogged with filth coming from the sewers that the water will not pass away into the chalk. The value of Dunstable Park is substantially lessened by reason of its being made the receptacle for the sewage of a large part of Dunstable, but there is no evidence of injurious effect upon health. Among the houses which thus drain into Dunstable Park are a number of houses belonging to the plaintiff, and some of them drain by means of the Church Street sewer, passing through the land of other persons before reaching Dunstable Park.

I In their defence the defendants pleaded a lost grant and acquiescence by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title, and they alleged that the drain connections had been made without their sanction or authority, and in some cases in spite of direct orders to the contrary; that the various householders had thereby acquired prescriptive rights to the use of such sewers; and that the defendants had no control over the matter.

I By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 21:

“The owner or occupier of the premises within the district of a local authority shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of that authority on condition of his giving such notice as may be required by that authority of his intention so to do, and of complying with the regulations of that authority in respect of the mode in which the communications between such drains and sewers are to be made, or subject to the control of any person who may be appointed by that authority to superintend the making of such communications.

Any person causing a drain to empty into a sewer of a local authority without complying with the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and the local authority may close any communication between a drain and a sewer made in contravention of this section, and may recover in a summary manner from the person so offending any expenses incurred by them under this section."

May 19, 1899. COZENS-HARDY, J., stated the facts and continued: In this state of facts several distinct questions arise for my decision. The defendants, by an amendment, which I allowed at the trial, allege that the owners in fee of Dunstable Park granted to trustees for the inhabitants of the parish the right to drain all surface water of the parish and all sewage and drainage from any messuages or tenements built, or to be built, within the parish, and to discharge such water and sewage through ditches or sewers on to Dunstable Park, but that such grant has been lost, and they further allege that the plaintiff has acquiesced in, and taken advantage of, such grant, and uses the existing system of sewage. This claim, if well-founded, disposes of the whole action; but, in my judgment, it cannot be maintained. A lost grant is a valuable legal fiction devised to support long-continued possession and oft-repeated acts, which otherwise could not be legally justified. Thus, prior to the Prescription Act, 1832, it was the custom to direct juries to find a lost grant after more than twenty years' enjoyment of an easement. Haigh v. West (3) is a modern example of the use of this fiction. But the evidence in the present case falls far short of what is requisite to raise the presumption of a lost grant. Such a grant must have been made before 1846, and the state of things existing at that date was essentially different from the present state of things. It would be highly dangerous to allow the trivial and occasional passage along a natural channel of water more or less contaminated to ripen into a legal claim to pour sewage of all kinds and of indefinite amount along such natural channel. I, therefore, hold that the defendants' claim of right fails, and I must grant an injunction to restrain them from exercising that alleged right.

This, however, by no means disposes of the action, and it remains to consider to what, if any, further relief the plaintiff is entitled. In the first place, there are a large number of houses in respect of which prescriptive rights to pass sewage into and along the sewers have been gained. And it is plain that no injunction can be granted which will interfere with such rights. For this reason, among others, it is impossible for me to make any order which will involve the complete closing or abandonment of the sewers. In the second place, there are other houses, the connections of which with the sewers have been made with the consent or by the acquiescence of the defendants, and it is settled law that I cannot interfere with them: A.-G. v. Clerkenwell Vestry (4). In the third place, there are a few houses which have been connected with the sewers, in spite of the protest of the defendants, and the plaintiff contends that the defendants ought to stop up these connections. But I think the defendants must be taken to have acquiesced in that to which they at first objected, so that these houses really fall under the second head. If, however, I am wrong in this, they must be treated as falling under the fourth head. In the fourth place, the plaintiff contends that an injunction ought to be granted to restrain the defendants from allowing any future connections to be made. The defendants are willing, if they fail, as I hold they have failed, in their major claim of right, to undertake not to authorise or direct any such connection, but beyond this they will not go. The strength of the plaintiff's case lies in this, that the defendants can, without being guilty of any trespass, stop up any future connection with their sewers, and it is urged that this is the true test, and that which has been applied by the court in similar cases. On the other hand, it is urged that under s. 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a householder adjoining the sewer has a right to connect his house with the sewer, and could obtain an injunction if the defendants absolutely refused on any terms to allow him to connect his house with the sewer.

It is necessary to consider some of the authorities cited by counsel on this point. In A.-G. v. Dorking Union (5) it was held in 1882 by the Court of Appeal that where a sanitary authority had not themselves constructed the sewers which were a nuisance, but only permitted them to be used as formerly by the inhabitants, they could not be restrained by injunction. But SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. (20 Ch.D. p. 606), laid stress upon the fact that the defendants could not physically put an end to the nuisance, and could only proceed by means of actions for injunction against persons who, with or without legal justification, were pouring sewage matter into the defendants' sewers. Section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was cited, but SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., does not seem to have considered that section to be material. In the same year in A.-G. v. Acton Local Board (6), FRY, J., refused to grant a mandatory injunction, which would compel the stopping up of existing drains, but he granted an injunction as to the future, restraining the defendants from directing or authorising sewage to flow into the sewers in question, but he deliberately declined to insert in the injunction the word "permitting."

In the following year, 1883, Charles v. Finchley Local Board (2) came before PEARSON, J., who granted an injunction restraining the local board from allowing sewage to flow into a brook opposite the plaintiff's house on the ground that they could at any time physically put an end to the nuisance without any action at all. This decision was primarily based upon the fact that the defendants had given permission to the third person to lay down a pipe from his house to the brook to pass pure water only, and that as he, in breach of their permission, was sending sewage through the pipe, they could, and ought to, revoke the permission. This may be a sufficient ground for the decision, but the learned judge (23 Ch.D. at p. 775) expressly held that the local board had a right under s. 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to abate the nuisance without asking any leave, and without bringing any action. I am not satisfied that in the Finchley Case (2) there was any sewer to which s. 21 would be applicable, but this does not diminish the weight to be attached to the deliberate opinion of PEARSON, J. He certainly held that the board could prevent an adjoining owner from connecting with the sewer. In 1891, in Ainley v. Kirkheaton Local Board (1), STIRLING, J., held that under s. 21 a right is given to the owner or occupier to drain into an existing sewer, without reference to the question of whether sewage matter, if it once enters the sewer, occasions a nuisance to a third party.

This absolute right is no doubt subject to any regulations in respect of the mode of making connections, and subject to the control of any person appointed to superintend the making of the connections, but no regulations can justify an absolute refusal to allow a connection to be made on any terms. No regulations under s. 21 have been made by the defendants. But certain byelaws were made by their predecessors, the local board of health, in 1864. The 20th byelaw is the only relevant byelaw, and I assume that it is in force. It prescribes no notice, and it only directs that the drains of all houses shall be connected with the sewers in such manner as the local surveyor shall direct. It is obvious that under this byelaw the surveyor can only prescribe the manner of connection—he cannot refuse to allow any connection. Upon consideration I adopt the view of STIRLING, J., in preference to the view of PEARSON, J., and I must follow the precedent of FRY, J., and decline to grant an injunction which would prohibit the defendants from permitting or allowing fresh connections to be made, or, in other words, would oblige the defendants to stop up all future connections. A sanitary authority, in whom sewers are vested, has only a limited property in these sewers. It is not in the same position as an owner of a private sewer, who can absolutely prevent any one from touching his property. It seems to me that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy. He ought to have applied to the Local Government Board to make an order under s. 299, which might ultimately be enforced by writ mandamus. A

There are two minor points which I have not overlooked. It is said that the defendants ought to be restrained from allowing the sewage from the town hall to pass into the sewer. But the defendants are sued as the urban sanitary authority only, and not as owners of the town hall. I am not satisfied that the town hall has not a prescriptive right; but however that may be, I am not prepared to give the plaintiff a relief which is not sought by the pleadings. Again, it is said that the reversal of the gradient of the sewer in High Street for the purpose of bringing the Dog Kennel sewage into Dunstable Park increased the burden on the plaintiff's property, and was an illegal act on the part of the defendants. But I think it was really done in order to satisfy the plaintiff's complaints, and to relieve him from the legal liability which rested upon him by reason of his covenant. The houses draining into this short reversed sewer are those which drained into the unreversed sewer, and are few in number, and I cannot interfere with their de facto enjoyment of the sewer. To grant an injunction in respect of these two matters might occasion serious damage to health without conferring any benefit upon the plaintiff, and this is a consideration to which weight ought to be attached. B
C

The result is that I must grant an injunction restraining the defendants, as the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Dunstable, from directing or authorising any sewage or foul matter to flow or to be discharged from sewers or drains vested in them as such sanitary authority on to Dunstable Park. With respect to the costs, I think it is not possible to distinguish the costs attributable to the claim of the defendants of a right to send sewage into Dunstable Park from the other costs. And I see no reason why the defendants should be relieved from any part of the costs of this litigation. D

*Bankruptcy—Evidence—Notes taken at public examination—Admissibility against bankrupt—Notes taken by shorthand writer, but not read over to or signed by the bankrupt—Admissibility of parol evidence by shorthand writer of admissions made by bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 17 (8). I

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17 (8) [now s. 15 (8) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]: "The debtor shall be examined on oath, and it shall be his duty to answer all such questions as the court may put or allow to be put to him. Case Stated by the deputy recorder for the city of Leeds.

F The defendant, Max Erdheim, was tried before the deputy recorder for the city of Leeds in January, 1906, upon an indictment charging him with the commission of the following misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 11, namely, not discovering part of his property to the trustee in his bankruptcy, fraudulently removing goods to the value of £10 within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, making material omissions from documents relating to his affairs, and attempting to account for his property by fictitious expenses.

G The following facts were stated in the Case: On May 3, 1895, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the defendant in the Leeds County Court, and a receiving order was duly made thereon. On May 20, 1895, the defendant was adjudged bankrupt. Pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17, the public examination of the defendant was held before the county court on June 25, 1895, and by adjournment on H July 9, July 23, Sept. 24 and Nov. 19, 1895, respectively, upon which last day the examination was adjourned sine die, and had not been resumed at the date of the trial.

I Under s. 17 (8) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and r. 67 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, the county court appointed William Foster Greenhalgh to take down in shorthand the evidence of the defendant at the said public examination, and to make transcripts of the questions and answers put to and given by the defendant at the said public examination, and those transcripts were to be the notes of the examination under s. 17. On each of the five days of the public examination of the defendant, Greenhalgh took down in shorthand the evidence of the defendant, and made transcripts of the questions and answers. None of the transcripts were read over to or signed by the defendant. Greenhalgh was called as a witness for the prosecution at the trial, and proved formally the various matters stated above. As the notes of the public examination could not be used in evidence against the defendant, the counsel for the Crown proposed to give parol proof of admissions, made by the defendant in the course of the public examination, of facts tending to establish the charges contained in the indictment, and for that purpose tendered the further evidence of Greenhalgh so that he might prove those admissions verbally. A

Counsel for the defendant objected that the further evidence of Greenhalgh was not admissible on two grounds. First, that the public examination never having been completed, the defendant might not have had an opportunity to make a complete statement and explanation with regard to everything charged against him; and, secondly, that inasmuch as the notes of the examination had not been read over to or signed by the defendant, s. 17 had not been complied with and no other evidence could be given of any admission made by him at the public examination. The deputy recorder overruled both the objections stating that with regard to the first, it could only appear when proof was tendered of it whether the statement were incomplete or not. He found as a fact that no incomplete statement was given in evidence before him. As to the second objection he decided that since the public examination and the notes of the defendant's evidence had been properly taken in accordance with s. 17, and that by law the defendant was compelled to answer upon oath all questions the court might put or allow to be put to him, whether tending to criminate him or not, and that the statute was permissive only as to making the notes of evidence, the fact that those notes had not been read over to and signed by the defendant did not exclude the ordinary rule of law that parol admissions made by a prisoner might be proved by the parol evidence of some person who heard them. He therefore permitted the further evidence of Greenhalgh to be given, and left all the facts proved by him and the other witnesses to the jury who found the defendant guilty on all the counts of the indictment. B C D

The question of law reserved for the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases principle nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare was relied upon. I proceed to consider the trial. E

June 2, 1896. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment: The defendant was charged with certain misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869. On May 20, 1895, he had been duly adjudicated bankrupt, and under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17, he had been duly examined on oath on five different days, and on the last of those days—namely, Nov. 19, 1895—the examination was adjourned sine die. During his examination a shorthand writer had taken down in shorthand the evidence of the defendant and made a transcript of it, but the transcript was not read over to or by or signed by the defendant. At the trial parol evidence of the shorthand writer was tendered and received of statements or admissions made by the defendant in the course of his examination of facts tending to establish the misdemeanours with which he was charged. The question is, was that parol evidence properly admitted? G H

It was argued that it was improperly admitted—first, on the ground that the examination, having been adjourned sine die, was not completed, and therefore the defendant might not have had the opportunity of making a complete statement and explanation. As to this, it is to be observed that the deputy recorder has in the case before us found as a fact that no incomplete statement was given in evidence, by which I understand him to mean that the statements of which evidence was given were not fragmentary, but were, as far as the particular facts dealt with by them, complete. This however, is not, I apprehend, the character of the objection in fact urged. That objection I understand to be that, even if otherwise admissible, the parol evidence of the statements made was not admissible, because the examination was adjourned sine die and was not in that sense complete. In my judgment, whichever form the objection takes, it is one which goes only to the effect and weight of I

A the evidence, and not to its admissibility. If the jury thought that the statements were fragmentary or incomplete it would properly affect the weight they would think it just to attribute to them, but their admissibility would not be thereby affected.

B The second and main objection urged is that upon the true construction of s. 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the only evidence which can be received of the statements made by the bankrupt is the transcript taken down in writing and read over to and signed by the debtor under that Act, or read over by the debtor and signed by him under the later Act of 1890. A further objection urged was that any such transcript, even if read over and signed, would not be admissible in a criminal prosecution, and that à fortiori parol evidence of statements made during the examination was not admissible in such a prosecution. In support of these objections the principle nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare was relied upon. I proceed to consider C these contentions.

The principle referred to has undoubtedly been regarded as an important one. LORD ELDON described it in Re Worrall, Ex parte Cossens (1) as one of the most sacred principles of the law. But he proceeds to point out that he has always understood that proposition to admit of a qualification with respect to the jurisdiction in D bankruptcy—namely, that a bankrupt cannot refuse to discover his estate and effects and particulars relating to them, though, in the course of giving information to his creditors, that information may tend to show that he has committed a criminal offence. He points out that, under the law then existing, while the commissioners would not compel a bankrupt to answer a question directly aimed at incriminating him, they would compel him to answer questions which might tend in that direction. E I am, however, relieved from the necessity of considering old authorities on this subject, as express statutory provisions have taken the place of usage and judicial authority, and the latter are only useful in so far as they may throw light upon the proper principle of construction to be applied to Acts of the legislature. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, s. 117 [repealed], it was provided that the court might F summon the bankrupt before it, and, if necessary, compel his attendance by warrant, and that it should be lawful for the court to examine the bankrupt (after he had made a solemn declaration to speak the truth) touching all matters relating to his trade, dealings, or estate, or which might tend to disclose any secret grant or concealment, and to reduce his answers into writing, which examination when reduced into writing the bankrupt should sign and subscribe.

The construction and effect of that section were carefully considered in R. v. Scott G (2). In that case the answers of the bankrupt had been reduced into writing and signed by him. Questions were put to the bankrupt and answered by him, under threat of committal, in relation to his trade books, and these are stated in the Case framed by WILLES, J., for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, to have influenced the jury against the prisoner, and tended to cause his conviction. It was objected in that case that the statements, being made after a declaration H tantamount to an oath, they were inadmissible; secondly, that they were not voluntary; and, thirdly, were made after threats from a person in authority; but the court (COLERIDGE, J., dissenting) held that the signed statement was admissible. As to the first objection, the court held that, if the examination was taken under oath administered by proper authority, it is admissible. As to the objection that the statements were not voluntary, it was held that such an objection does not apply I to a lawful examination in the course of a judicial proceeding, and, as to the alleged threats, two or three were no more than a warning to the defendant of the consequences which in point of law would follow from his refusing to give a true answer to the questions put to him. Lastly, as to the arguments based upon the principle nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare, the court held that the statute of 1849 had in the case in question taken away this privilege, by enacting that he must answer touching all matters relating to his trade or estate without any qualification. It is to be observed that in this case there was no express provision that the answers of the bankrupt should be admissible in evidence against him.

In my judgment the principles enunciated in this case (with the decision in which I entirely agree) practically determine the present case, but as the precise question here reserved turns upon a later statute, it is necessary to examine that later statute. The examination in question took place under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17 of which provides that the court may appoint a day for the examination of the debtor, at which he shall be examined as to his conduct, dealings, and property. It provides that the court may adjourn the examination from time to time, that the official receiver may take part in the examination and, if authorised, may employ a solicitor with or without counsel; a trustee, if appointed before the examination concludes, may take part in it; the court may put such questions to the debtor as it may think expedient, and lastly it is provided by sub-s. (8) :

“The debtor shall be examined upon oath, and it shall be his duty to answer all such questions as the court may put or allow to be put to him. Such notes of the examination as the court thinks proper shall be taken down in writing, and shall be read over to and signed by the debtor, and may thereafter be used in evidence against him. They shall also be open to the inspection of any creditor at all reasonable times.”

Finally, by sub-s. (9) [now s. 15 (9) of the 1914 Act], when the court is of opinion that the affairs of the debtor have been sufficiently investigated, it shall declare the examination concluded. As to the subjects upon which the debtor may be examined, it is to be observed that his “conduct” is included, a word not found in s. 117 of the Act of 1849 [repealed]. In my judgment this makes no difference, and I think that under the former Act the matter intended to be covered, as I conceive by that word in the latter section, could have been made the subject of examination under the former Act. It seems to me that “conduct” there relates to the matters referred to in s. 28 [see now s. 26 of the 1914 Act] dealing with the considerations which the court ought to weigh as to granting or refusing an order of discharge, or as to the terms on which such order may be granted.

To return to the construction of this section, it will be seen that the examination, if authenticated as provided in sub-s. (8), may thereafter be used in evidence against the bankrupt without any qualification pointing to its exclusion in the case of criminal proceedings. Indeed, seeing that a bankrupt is not likely to be the subject of civil proceedings, it is more difficult to suppose that the exclusion of criminal proceedings could have been intended. I think, therefore, it must be taken as clear, conformably with the decision in R. v. Scott (2), that, if duly authenticated as provided by sub-s. (8) the examination could properly be used against the defendant on a criminal charge. It is equally clear that, not being regularly authenticated, it cannot be put in evidence. If it could, it would become in itself, without further proof than compliance with the formal provisions of the Act, substantive evidence, but the point that we have here to decide is: Is such authenticated examination the sole evidence which can be given of statements or admissions of the defendant during his examination? I am clearly of opinion that it is not. In the first place, the statute does not say that it shall be the only evidence of his statements. In the next place, his statements have been made on an occasion when he was under lawful examination on oath, and therefore are not to be regarded as induced by threats, or promises, or under undue influence, circumstances which would properly cause them to be regarded as not being voluntary, and therefore inadmissible. I regard the statutory provision, therefore, as one intended to provide only for the most authentic way of presenting to the court the statements made, but not at all as intended to exclude all other modes of giving evidence of statements made by the defendant in the course of his examination. We cannot give effect to the objection made without construing the statute as if it had said, which it does not, that the authenticated examination shall alone be received as evidence of the statements so made.

If, then, this view is correct, is there any rule of law by which his evidence should be excluded? I know of none. I take the general rule to be (apart from any express statutory exceptions) that any statement made by a party relevant to the matter in hand may be given in evidence against him in any civil case and also in any criminal case, except where such statement is made upon oath improperly administered, or where such statement is not voluntary within the principle to which I have already referred. I think this view is strengthened by the provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 27 [repealed. The point no longer calls for report].

It has been objected that the broad principle which I have expressed would recognise the admissibility of the evidence of any person as well as the shorthand writer as to the statements or admissions made by a bankrupt during his examination. This is quite true, it would. But this seems to me to be only an objection to the weight and reliability of the evidence, not to its admissibility, and I have no fear that, in the application in practice of the principle enunciated, both judges and juries may not well be trusted to discriminate between evidence of statements accurately recorded and formally authenticated and evidence of statements which do not fall within that category. In the result, therefore, the conviction will be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B., HAWKINS, CAVE, and WILLS, JJ., concurred.

The doctrine of consolidation of mortgages applies where at the date when redemption is sought all the mortgages are united in one hand and redeemable by the same person, or where, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated. The right to consolidate exists, therefore, notwithstanding that the mortgages which it is sought to consolidate were not united in title with the mortgage sought to be redeemed until after the assignment of the equities or redemption by the mortgagor to the person who seeks to redeem.

Appeal by the plaintiff in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HERSHELL, L.C., and LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) reported sub nom. Pledge v. Carr, [1895] 1 Ch. 51, affirming a decision of ROMER, J., reported [1894] 2 Ch. 328, holding that the defendants were entitled to consolidate their mortgages on seven properties against the plaintiff, who sought to redeem only one of them. F

Briefly, the facts were that James Banks had been the owner of all seven properties, and had mortgaged each of them by various deeds to various persons. He later assigned the equity of redemption in all seven properties to Brockman and Harrison, the predecessors in title of the plaintiff, but at the date of that assignment not all the mortgages were united in the same hands. The mortgages did later become united in the defendants' hands and the question arose whether the defendants were entitled to consolidate their mortgages. ROMER, J., and the Court of Appeal held that the defendants were entitled to consolidate their mortgages on all seven properties. The plaintiff appealed. G

The facts appear more fully in the opinion of LORD DAVEY. H

Lerett, Q.C., Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Cator for the appellant.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and E. Ward for the respondents. I

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 21, 1896. LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I have had an opportunity of considering the opinion prepared by LORD DAVEY, and I am not prepared to dissent from it. I use that form of expression because I confess that I lament the conclusion to which it has been found necessary to come, although I believe that the strict principle upon which it rests is founded in our law at present; and in dealing with a technical system it is better to adhere to a principle when once established than to create greater confusion by dissenting from it. I think the principle laid down in Vint

v. Padget (1) has been so firmly established now by authority in our technical system that I feel that more mischief would be done by dissenting from it than by acquiescing in it. For these reasons I am content with the opinion which my noble and learned friend has prepared, and shall assent to the motion that he will make.

LORD WATSON.—I also have had an opportunity of carefully considering the opinion about to be delivered by LORD DAVEY. For my own part I should have desired, if possible, to decide otherwise, but I am compelled to say that I concur with the reasoning and the conclusion of my noble and learned friend.

LORD DAVEY.—The facts of this case are complicated, but they may be stated in a narrow compass sufficiently for elucidating the point of law which is raised. There are seven different properties which are involved in this appeal. There were originally eight, but one of the properties, known as 1 and 2, Shakespeare Terrace, has been dealt with in a separate suit (see Minter v. Carr (3) ), and the rights of the appellant and respondents in respect of that property are not now in question.

One James Banks was the original owner and mortgagor of all these seven properties. James Banks mortgaged 34, Bouverie Square, and 5 and 6, Shakespeare Terrace (which I will refer to as Nos. 1 and 2), to John Banks, by deeds dated respectively May 11 and Aug. 26, 1863. He mortgaged Pembury Villa (which I refer to as No. 3) on Oct. 12, 1863, to S. Hobday, and the other four properties (which I will refer to as Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7) to other mortgagees by deeds dated from Oct. 18, 1865, to Nov. 24, 1866. He then made a second mortgage to Brockman of 4, 5, 6, and 7, by a deed or deeds dated Nov. 27, 1866. He then made a second mortgage of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and a third mortgage of 4, 5, 6, and 7, to Brockman and Harrison, by one deed, dated Aug. 20, 1868. Or, in other words, on that date Banks assigned the equity of redemption in all seven properties to Brockman and Harrison. At that date, therefore, Brockman and Harrison might have redeemed 1, 2, or 3, without redeeming the other properties, but they could not have redeemed either 4, 5, 6, or 7 without redeeming all those four properties. Pledge, the present plaintiff and appellant, because the transferee from Brockman and Harrison of their equity of redemption of all the seven properties on April 1, 1885. In the meantime, R. T. Brockman, by deeds dated from 1871 to 1873, became the transferee of the first mortgages on Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5. The defendants and respondents are the surviving executors of R. T. Brockman, who is dead, and on Dec. 27, 1890, they became the transferees of the first mortgage on No. 3. From that date, therefore, the equity of redemption on all seven properties was vested in the appellant, subject to mortgages on the several properties all vested in the respondents.

In these circumstances, on Mar. 30, 1893, the appellant issued a writ in this action, by which he claims a right to redeem No. 2 alone on payment of what is due on the first mortgage of that property only. The respondents claim a right to consolidate their mortgages on all the seven properties, and say that the appellant cannot redeem No. 2 alone without redeeming the other six properties also. It was admitted at the Bar that the respondents had the right to consolidate their mortgages on Nos. 1 and 2, because the mortgages on those properties were vested in one mortgagee, John Banks, before the assignment of the equity of redemption in both to Brockman and Harrison, the appellant's predecessors in title; but the appellant contends that they are not entitled to consolidate their mortgages on 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 with their mortgage on No. 2, because these mortgages did not become united in title with the mortgage which he desires to redeem on No. 2 until after the date on which the equity of redemption was assigned to his predecessors in title—namely, Aug. 20, 1868—and his counsel argues that the rights of the appellant and respondents must be determined by the state of circumstances at that date.

The question for your Lordships' decision is whether the respondents have the right of consolidation which they claim, notwithstanding that the mortgages which it is sought to consolidate were not united in title with the mortgage sought to be redeemed until after the assignment of the equity of redemption to the present appellant's predecessors in title. ROMER, J., by whom the action was tried, and the Court of Appeal, held that the case was covered by the decision of KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ., in 1858, in Vint v. Padget (1), which it was not competent for them to question, and accordingly decided in favour of the respondents. The appellant's counsel admit that they cannot distinguish the present case from that decision, but contend that it is wrong and ought to be reversed by your Lordships.

The equitable rule as to the consolidation of mortgages is not one of those doctrines of the Court of Chancery which has met with general approbation—at any rate as regards its later development. Originally it may have been a right of a mortgagee holding two separate mortgages on estates of the same mortgagor which have become absolute estates at law against the mortgagor and debtor personally to refuse to be redeemed as regards one estate without having his other debt also paid. But it has been long settled that the right of consolidation may be exercised by the transferee of the mortgages as well as by the original mortgagee, and may be exercised in respect of equitable mortgages as well as by a mortgagee holding the legal estate absolute at law; and, on the other hand, that it may be asserted against the assignee of an equity of redemption from the mortgagor as well as against the mortgagor himself. If Vint v. Padget (1) had been an isolated decision on a new point, then, notwithstanding the eminence of the learned judges who were parties to the decision, it may be that your Lordships would have felt disposed to review it, and if it did not appear to your Lordships a necessary or legitimate development of the doctrine, your Lordships would probably be disposed to express your dissent from it, as was done with regard to another decision of the same learned judges by this House, in Jennings v. Jordan (2). But it is obvious that the learned judges did not conceive themselves to be laying down new law. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that a long course and series of authorities binding on the court precluded the possibility of their thinking that there was in the case more than one arguable question, if any—namely, as to the materiality of notice of a second mortgage to a transfer of prior mortgages—and TURNER, L.J., said it was impossible to distinguish the case from Bovey v. Shipwich (4)—a case decided in the reign of Charles II, to which I will presently refer—on any other ground than as to notice being material.

In Tweeddale v. Tweeddale (5), decided in 1857, the year before Vint v. Padget (1), the union of two mortgages made to different mortgagees took place after the assignment of the equity of redemption of both mortgaged properties. LORD ROMILLY, M.R., held that the assignee could only stand in the position of mortgagor, and be entitled to his rights only; and if the mortgagor could not have redeemed one property without the other, the assignee stood in no better or more favourable position, and was not entitled to redeem one without redeeming the other. Indeed the contrary seems from the report to have been scarcely argued in that case.

Vint v. Padget (1) came before STUART, V.-C., in the first instance, and his judgment may be referred to as showing how entirely that experienced judge considered the point to be settled. He said:

“In accepting by way of security the equity of redemption of two separate estates, Mr. Lee deliberately incurred the risk of their uniting in one hand, and when that union has taken place there is only one single debt; and in order to redeem he must pay off both mortgages, each of which affects the entirety of both estates.”

The old case of Bovey v. Shipwich (4), referred to by TURNER, L.J., was a combined case of tacking (in the strict sense) and consolidation. There was—

A first, a mortgage with conveyance of the legal estate in two properties; secondly, an assignment of the equity of redemption in the two properties to a second mortgagee; thirdly, a third mortgage of one of the properties only without notice of the second mortgage. The third mortgagee bought and took a transfer of the first legal mortgage. It was held—first, that he might tack his equitable third mortgage to the first mortgage, so as to gain priority over the second mortgagee; B and secondly, that, having done so, he might consolidate his third mortgage (which was on one estate only) with the first mortgage on both estates and hold the two estates as against the second mortgage until all that was due to him on both securities should be satisfied.

C Titley v. Davies (6), before LORD HARDWICKE, may be distinguished on the ground that Titley, the second equitable mortgagee of one of the estates, had before the assignment of the equity of redemption in another estate to Peyton acquired a right to redeem Shephard, the first mortgagee on both estates, and thereby consolidate the two mortgages. It is not, therefore, in my opinion, a direct authority on the present case, in which the consolidation has taken place by purchase and transfer, and not by the exercise of an existing right to redeem.

D In Selby v. Pomfret (7) (1861), before WOOD, V.-C., and on appeal before LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., the facts, so far as material for the present purpose, were—first, mortgage to defendants of leasehold premises in Mark Lane on June 26, 1858; secondly, mortgage to Stileman and Neale of leasehold premises in Herne Hill on Feb. 1, 1859; thirdly, mortgagor became bankrupt on Feb. 9, 1859; fourthly, transfer of the Herne Hill mortgage to defendants on Feb. 18, 1859. The Vice-Chancellor held that the defendants were entitled to consolidate the two mortgages E against the assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and to retain the balance due on the Mark Lane mortgage, which was deficient, out of the surplus proceeds of sale of the Herne Hill mortgage. LORD CAMPBELL, in affirming the Vice-Chancellor's decree, said (3 De G. F. & J. at p. 597):

F "It does seem strange that mortgagees after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor should be allowed by their own act to vary the rights of themselves and the other creditors of the mortgagor, so as to obtain payment in full of a debt in respect of which, at the time of the bankruptcy, they were only entitled to a dividend along with the body of unsecured creditors. But it is settled that a mortgage executed by a bankrupt before his bankruptcy, where the value of the land mortgaged exceeds the sum secured, is, upon the bankruptcy of the G mortgagor, to be considered tabula in naufragio, and if the assignees do not immediately redeem, any mortgagee of the bankrupt, whose security is insufficient, may take an assignment of the mortgage and tack to it the debt due under the mortgage to himself. Therefore, the Vice-Chancellor truly observes,

H "The fact of the bankruptcy before the defendants took the transfer made no difference. Anyone might seize the plank. The assignees might have got the benefit of it if they had been quick enough; but the defendants were more alert." "

And see Neve v. Pennell (8). Although the Lord Chancellor uses the word "tack," it is apparent from the facts of the case with which he was dealing that he meant I tacking in the sense of consolidation. Selby v. Pomfret (7) may, no doubt, be distinguished from the present case on the ground that the assignment of the equity of redemption was by operation of law; but if there was no existing right of consolidation at the date of the bankruptcy the distinction seems to me unsubstantial, because the assignees of the bankrupt take his property subject only to existing equities. The statutory jus tertii of the creditors may be considered as entitled to consideration.

In Beeror v. Luck (9) (1867), WOOD, V.-C., held that a mortgagee of one property might, as against the assignee of the equity of redemption of another property, consolidate with his mortgage a mortgage from the same mortgagor on that other property of which he had taken a transfer after the date of the assignment of the equity of redemption of the second property only, overruling White v. Hillacre (10). The extent to which the right of consolidation was carried in this case was criticised by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in this House, in Jennings v. Jordan (2), and so far as it held that mortgages on two properties could be consolidated against the assignee of the equity of redemption of one property only, where the union of the two mortgages did not take place until after the separation of the equities of redemption, Beeror v. Luck (9) must be held to be overruled. It was so considered by FRY, J., in Harter v. Colman (11).

The present case is free from any such difficulty. At the time when redemption is sought all the mortgages are presently redeemable by the same person. Pledge, the plaintiff in the action, became by one transaction the assignee of the entire equity of redemption of all the mortgages. An attentive consideration of LORD SELBORNE'S opinion has satisfied me that the noble and learned Lord did not intend to throw any doubt upon the application of the doctrine in such circumstances.

The actual point decided in Jennings v. Jordan (2) was that a mortgagee could not as against the assignee of an equity of redemption of one property consolidate with his original mortgage a mortgage on another property created by the same mortgagor after the assignment of the equity of redemption. The contrary had been maintained by the plaintiff on what was probably a misunderstanding of Tassell v. Smith (12). LORD BLACKBURN said (6 App. Cas. at p. 714):

"I take it that the only question before this House is whether, where the mortgage on one property is not created till after the equity of redemption on the other property has been parted with, there is, as against the purchaser, an equity to consolidate the two."

Their Lordships also discussed the question whether, in a case where the equities of redemption have become separated, consolidation could take place against the assignee of one equity of redemption only by subsequent union of two mortgages, and they preferred the decision in White v. Hillacre (10) to that of WOOD, V.-C., in Beeror v. Luck (9). LORD SELBORNE expressed himself in the following words (6 App. Cas. at pp. 700, 701):

"A mortgagee, who holds several distinct mortgages under the same mortgagor, redeemable, not by express contract, but only by virtue of the right which (in English jurisprudence) is called 'equity of redemption,' may within certain limits, and against certain persons (entitled to redeem all or some of them), consolidate them, that is, treat them as one, and decline to be redeemed as to any, unless he is redeemed as to all. This doctrine of consolidation is well established, and cannot now be altered except by the legislature, whether it originally rested on a sound equitable foundation or not. The present question is as to its proper limits. There is no difficulty in its application, when all the mortgages, whether originally made to the same mortgagee, or having come into a single hand by subsequent assignments, are redeemable at the same time by the same person. Its extension to a case in which, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated by the act of the person in whom they had been combined, though it may perhaps be open to some objection on practical grounds, rests upon an intelligible principle."

After discussing the principle on which such an extension can be defended, LORD SELBORNE, continues (ibid.):

"In the present case, the rights of redemption existing at the date of the settlement of 1838 could not, in my opinion, have been properly worked out (unless by some voluntary arrangement between the parties interested), otherwise than by consolidating all the mortgages now vested in the appellant

A Jennings, which were prior in their creation to Dec. 3, 1838; as they have been, in fact, consolidated by the decree of the Court of Appeal. I have much more difficulty in following, or satisfactorily explaining, the principle of some other authorities (such as Beevor v. Luck (9)), which have held (contrary to the decision of ALDERSON, B., in White v. Hillacre (10)) that a mortgagee's right to consolidate as against the purchaser of the equity of redemption of property mortgaged to him, is capable of being enlarged, after the date of that purchase, by a transfer to the mortgagee of other mortgages, which were then in other hands, and with the equity of redemption of which (if there were no consolidation) the purchaser would have nothing to do."

B I understand LORD SELBORNE to be here speaking only of the case in which the equities of redemption have become separated, and his observations have no reference to a case such as that now before the House, in which all the equities of redemption have been assigned to, and are now vested in, one person. I do not think that anything was said in this House in Jennings v. Jordan (2) which throws any doubt or discredit on the decision in Vint v. Padget (1) and the other cases to the same effect.

C At the time when this action was commenced the exact position contemplated by LORD SELBORNE had taken place—all the mortgages being united in a single hand and redeemable by the same person. It appears from the facts of Jennings v. Jordan (2) that the union of the mortgages which Jennings was held entitled to consolidate did not take place until after the settlement of the equity of redemption under which the respondent Jordan claimed. But, in my opinion, no reliance can be placed on that circumstance, as the facts show that it was a case of successive equities of redemption—one mortgage being on property A., and the other on A. and B.—and not of consolidation simply. I mention this to avoid misapprehension. It appears to me that the position of an assignee of two or more equities of redemption from one mortgagor stands in a widely different position from the assignee of one equity only. He knows, or has the opportunity of knowing, what are the mortgages subject to which he has purchased the property, and he knows that they may become united by transfer in one hand. If the doctrine of consolidation be once admitted, it appears to me not unreasonable to hold that a person in such a position occupies the place of the mortgagor or assignor to him towards the holders of the mortgages, subject to which he has purchased, although it may be unreasonable to hold that he can be affected by the transfer to such holders of mortgages to other persons by the same mortgagor on property which he has not purchased, and with the equity of redemption of which he has no concern. He does not investigate the title to such other property, and cannot know in the latter case to what mortgages the property is subject.

D If your Lordships affirm the decree now under appeal, the doctrine of consolidation will be confined within at least intelligible limits. It will be applicable where, at the date when redemption is sought, all the mortgages are united in one hand and redeemable by the same person, or where, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated. If the purchaser of two or more equities of redemption desires to prevent consolidation, he has it in his power to redeem any one mortgage before consolidation takes place; but if for his own convenience he delays doing so, he runs the same risk as his assignor ran of the mortgages becoming united by transfer in one hand. I am of opinion that the application of the doctrine of consolidation to a case like the present has been too long considered part of the equitable jurisprudence of this country to be altered at the present time, and it is not so unreasonable as to demand a reversal of it by this House.

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Breach of covenant—Damages—Method of ascertainment—Action against under-lessee—Under-lessor's own liability to head landlord to be taken into account.

In assessing the damages in an action brought by an under-lessor against an under-lessee for breach of a repairing covenant, account should be taken of any liability of the under-lessor under a repairing covenant in the head lease, at least if the under-lessee had notice of that liability. The proper measure of damages payable to the under-lessor will be the diminution in the value of his reversion, and in an action brought shortly before the expiration of the underlease, this may properly be taken to be the cost of executing the repairs, less a rebate for the period which the underlease has still to run. No account can be taken of the fact that the head landlord may be willing to accept a lesser sum by way of damages from the under-lessor because he intends to put the premises to some other use and does not wish that the repairs should be executed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1895] 2 Ch. 377, affirmed.

Notes. The common law rule as to the measure of damages for breach of a repairing covenant has been modified by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1). The head landlord would now be precluded from recovering damages against the under-lessor if at or shortly after the end of the lease it is intended that the premises would be pulled down or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant. It is possible that in such circumstances the use to which the head landlord intends to put the premises might now be taken into account in assessing the damages payable by an under-lessee for breach of a repairing covenant in the underlease.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, LOPES, and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1895] 2 Ch. 377, affirming a decision of an official referee as to the amount of damages payable by them for the breach of a covenant to keep in repair.

The buildings in question were known as the Grecian Theatre, City Road, London, and they were occupied by one Booth for the purposes of the Salvation Army. The original lease of the premises was granted in 1840, by trustees for the parish of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, to one Rouse for sixty-one years from Michaelmas, 1837. The lease contained a usual repairing covenant by the tenant. Rouse, in March, 1851, granted an underlease to one Oliver for the original term less the last ten days thereof. The underlease contained a usual repairing covenant by the under-lessee, and also showed on the face of it that it was an underlease, as it contained several references to the superior landlord. It also reserved to the agents of the superior landlord liberty to come in and do repairs. The respondents now represented Rouse; the appellant Conquest now represented Oliver. Booth was assignee of the underlease, which contained a covenant by the under-lessee to keep the premises in repair. The respondents sued Conquest and Booth for damages for alleged breach of the covenant.

ROMER, J., in December, 1895, held that there had been a breach of the covenant, and referred it to the official referee to assess the amount of the damages. The official referee assessed the damages at £1,305, which, it was admitted, was the sum which it would cost to put the premises in proper repair, allowing a discount for the period for which the underlease had yet to run. The defendants alleged that the damages had been assessed on a wrong principle, and appealed to the Court of Appeal, which dismissed the appeal. The defendants then appealed to the House of Lords.

Haldane, Q.C., C. H. Sargant, and Courthope-Munroe for the appellants.

Jelf, Q.C., and R. F. Norton for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

July 30, 1896. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The appellants in the present case contend that the damage for the admitted breach of a contract to keep certain demised premises in repair have been assessed on a wrong principle.

The facts may be very shortly stated. In May, 1840, the then Bishop of London demised certain premises to Thomas Rouse for a term of sixty-one years from Michaelmas, 1837, at a rent of £350 a year. In March, 1851, a portion of these premises was demised to Benjamin Oliver, by way of underlease, for the original term less ten days at the same rent, being in effect an improved rent of about £100 a year. The covenants to keep the demised premises in repair and to deliver them up in good repair were in substantially the same terms in the lease and underlease. The respondents are the present trustees under the will of Thomas Rouse, the original lessee. The one appellant is the personal representative of Oliver, the sub-lessee, and the other is an assignee of the sub-lease. The premises comprised in the sub-lease not having been kept in repair pursuant to the covenant contained in it, the action in which this appeal arises was brought.

The assessment of damages was referred to Mr. Ridley, one of the official referees, who fixed them at the sum of £1,305. At the time when the case was heard there were about three and a half years of the term unexpired. He arrived at the sum named by ascertaining how much it would require to put the premises in the state of repair in which they would have been if the covenant had been observed, and then allowing a rebate from that sum in consideration of the fact that the lease had still some years to run. The Court of Appeal considered that, there having been notice to the sub-lessee of the original lease and of the covenants contained in it, it was right to take into account in assessing the damages the liability of the respondents on those covenants, and that the damages had been properly assessed on the basis of awarding to the respondents a sum which represented the diminution in the value of their reversion due to the breach of covenant by the appellants.

Where an action for non-repair had been brought during the currency of a lease, it was said by HOLT, C.J., in Virian v. Champion (1), in answer to the objection that it was a hard action, for maybe the lessee might leave the premises in repair at the end of the term and that therefore it was usual to give but small damages :

"We always inquire in these cases what it will cost to put the premises in repair, and give so much damages, and the plaintiff ought in justice to apply the damages to the repair of the premises."

In Doe d. Worcester Trustees v. Rowlands (2), COLERIDGE, J., said (9 C. & P. at p. 739) :

"In estimating the damages in cases where the lease has a long time to run, it is not fair to take the amount that would be necessary to put the premises into repair as the measure of damages. . . . The true question, therefore, is, to what extent is the reversion injured by the non-repair of the premises? If the lease had ninety-nine years to run it could not make much difference in the value of the reversion whether the premises were now in repair or not. This lease, however, will expire in about six years."

I may observe that what the learned judge said with regard to a lease having ninety-nine years to run would not be applicable in all cases. There are circumstances in which it might be of the utmost importance to the reversioners that the buildings should be in a proper state of repair. HOLT, C.J.'s, statement of the law has been subjected to criticism in other cases, notably by PARKE and ALDERSON, BB., in Turner v. Lamb (3). I do not think that any hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the damages which may be recovered by the covenantee during the currency of a lease in respect of the breach of a covenant to keep the demised premises in repair. All the circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration, and the damages must be assessed at such a sum as reasonably represents the damage which the covenantee has sustained by the breach of covenant. I quite agree with the criticism to which LORD HOLT'S view has been subjected if that learned judge intended to lay down that, whatever the circumstances and however long the term had to run, the damages must necessarily be what it would cost to put the premises into repair. On the other hand, I think it would be equally wrong to hold that this could never be the measure of damages whatever the circumstances and however nearly the term had expired.

But in the present case, if the test be applied of inquiring how much the value of the respondents' reversion has been diminished by the breach of covenant—a test for which I understand the appellants to contend—I cannot see that there has been any error in the assessment of damages. If the premises were now in good repair the reversion of the respondents would secure them the improved rent of £100 a year to the end of the term, without any liability on their part, unless it were to the extent to which repairs subsequently became necessary. As matters stand they can only receive this rent subject to the liability of restoring the premises to good repair, so that they may in that condition re-deliver them to their lessor. The difference between these two positions represents the diminution in the value of their reversion owing to the breach of covenant, and on this basis the damages seem to me to have been properly assessed.

A It was contended for the appellants that the respondents would not be bound in any case to spend upon the premises the sum necessary to put them in repair, or at the expiration of the term to pay that sum to their lessor. It was said that, owing to the nature of the premises and the changed circumstances of the neighbourhood, the freeholder would make an entirely different use of the site when the term he had created came to an end; that he would not desire to have the buildings then upon his land put in good repair, and that he would arrive at some arrangement with his lessee by which he would accept from him a sum less than the cost of effecting these repairs. I do not think that the court would do right, in assessing the damages in the present case, to involve itself, at the instance of the appellants, in considerations of that character. The duty of the appellants as between themselves and the respondents was to fulfil the obligation of the covenant into which they entered and to keep the premises in repair. If they had done so the present question would not have arisen. They have broken their covenant, and when sued for the breach they have, in my opinion, no right to demand that a speculative inquiry shall be entered upon as to what may possibly happen and what arrangements may possibly be come to, under the special circumstances of the case, when the superior lease expires by effluxion of time. I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

There is no general principle that a mortgagee cannot stipulate for a collateral advantage to himself. The real principle is that the mortgagee shall not impose on the mortgagor any unconscionable or oppressive bargain, and it is only on this broad principle that a stipulation in a mortgage which does not clog the equity of redemption can be invalid.

A covenant contained in a mortgage of a hotel to a brewer which provided that during the continuance of the mortgage (which was expressed to be irredeemable for five years) the mortgagors would only sell the mortgagee's beer held to be enforceable by the mortgagee.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of ROMER, J., whereby he granted the plaintiff, who was the mortgagee of the defendants' hotel, an interim injunction restraining the defendants from selling any beer other than the plaintiff's upon the mortgaged premises during the continuance of the mortgage.

The plaintiff Biggs was a brewer at Cardiff, and the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Hoddinott were the owners of the Witchell Hotel, at Cadoxton, Glamorganshire, and carried on business there. By an indenture, dated Mar. 18, 1896, certain mortgages on the Witchell Hotel were transferred to the plaintiff, and a further advance by him was secured, amounting in all to £7,654. The defendants covenanted in the usual way for payment of the principal with interest at £5 per cent. on Sept. 18 next, and they also jointly and severally covenanted that they and their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, owners or tenants for the time being of the said premises, would during the continuance of the security, take of and deal with the plaintiff and his successors for the time being in the brewery business only for all beers and stout, or any other description of malt liquors (except bottled beers) which should be vended to be consumed on or off the hotel and premises, and would not sell or permit the sale or consumption on the premises of any such liquors other than such as should have been purchased or taken of the plaintiff, his administrators, or assigns. There was also a covenant by the plaintiff that during the continuance of the security he would supply the mortgagors with beer, etc., of the kind and quality which goods of a similar nature were for the time being supplied to his ordinary customers at certain schedule prices. The deed also contained a covenant by the plaintiff that, so long as the mortgagors observed the covenants on their part therein contained, he would not call in the principal moneys owing thereon before Mar. 18, 1901. It was also provided that, notwithstanding the proviso for redemption contained in the deed, the mortgagors should not be entitled to require or compel the mortgagee to receive the principal moneys before that date.

In April, 1898, the defendants ceased to purchase their beer from the plaintiff, and expressed an intention of not purchasing any more malt liquors from him, as A they had been advised that they were not bound by their covenant to do so. They also claimed to be entitled to redeem the mortgage at once, and on May 4, 1898, they tendered to the plaintiff the amount of the principal and interest then due on the mortgage, together with six months' interest in lieu of notice, but the plaintiff refused to accept it. On May 10 the defendants issued an originating summons asking for a declaration that they were entitled to redeem the mortgage at once on payment of principal and interest including six months' interest in lieu of notice. On May 23 the plaintiff issued the writ in this action claiming an injunction restraining the defendants during the continuance of the mortgage, their servants or agents, from selling or permitting the sale or consumption upon the mortgaged premises, of any beer or other malt liquors (other than bottled beer) which had not been purchased from the plaintiff, and damages. On June 10 the plaintiff moved for an interim injunction in the terms of his claim, and the defendants' summons was adjourned into court, and came on for hearing with the motion.

On the hearing of the defendants' summons, ROMER, J., held that the defendants were not entitled to redeem until the expiration of the five years; and on the plaintiff's motion granted an injunction restraining the defendants during the continuance of the mortgage, their servants or agents, from selling or permitting the sale or consumption upon the mortgaged premises of any beer or other malt liquors (other than bottled beer) which had not been purchased from the plaintiff. The defendants appealed from the order made on the plaintiff's motion.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—We have listened to a very ingenious and learned argument with a view to induce us to lay down a proposition of law which would be very unfortunate for business men. The proposition is, that while two people are engaged in a mortgage transaction they cannot enter into any other transaction with each other, and that any such transaction must be entered into before or after the mortgage, so that it cannot be said that the mortgagee gets any collateral advantage out of the mortgage.

Counsel for the defendants did not attempt to uphold this on any rational principle, but relied on authority. Of course we must follow the authorities whether we like them or not, but do they support that proposition? Jennings v. Ward (1) was the first case relied on. That was a redemption suit, and the stipulation which was in question seriously interfered with the right of redemption of the mortgaged property on payment of principal, interest, and costs, and SIR JOHN TREVOR, M.R., ordered redemption without regard to that stipulation. He said (2 Vern. at p. 520):

That language has found its way into the books, and it has been understood as if he meant exactly what he said without regard to the circumstances of that case, and it has been said that a mortgagee cannot have principal, interest, and costs, and also some collateral advantage. But when the authorities are considered, it is found that that general proposition has been departed from again and again. Take the case of West India mortgages, in which it has been often decided that a mortgagee who was not in possession might stipulate that he should be appointed consignee for the mortgagor. The proposition as stated in Jennings v. Ward (1) is too wide. If properly limited it is good law and good sense, and when one looks at the cases where it has been applied and those where it has not, one sees what it means.

The principle is this: A mortgage is regarded in equity as a security for the money advanced, and a mortgagor may always redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs; and no bargain which prevents such redemption is valid. There is another principle which is not peculiar to mortgages, and that is that an unconscionable bargain will not be enforced; and there is no case of any bargain being set aside which does not come under one of these two heads.

I think the decision of ROMER, J., was right; and to say, as we are asked to do, that a covenant like this one is a collateral advantage and must be disregarded as unconscionable would be to lay down a proposition which would shock any business man, and we are not driven to do it by authority and are not going to say that. The only way of making that out would be this, which was the view taken by HARGREAVE, J., in Re Edwards' Estate (2), that any stipulation in a mortgage for the benefit of the mortgagee is, because it is in a mortgage, presumed to be due to pressure upon the mortgagor by the mortgagee. The decision there was right, that the agreement in the mortgage which was relied on was invalid as preventing redemption; but what the judge said as to a stipulation being unreasonable because it was found in a mortgage is going too far. The decision of ROMER, J., was right, and the appeal will be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J. This is a mortgage for a term of years effected in the usual way, and it contains a covenant by the mortgagors during the continuance of the security to take all their beer from the mortgagee, and a covenant by the mortgagee to supply it. It is contended that the covenant by the mortgagors is void in equity.

The first observation I desire to make is that it in no way affects the equity of redemption, as redemption can take place just as if the covenant was not in the deed. There is no stipulation that damages for breach of the covenant shall be covered by the security, so this is not a case where the equity of redemption is affected. In equity a mortgage has always been looked upon as only a security for money, and here the right of the mortgagors to redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs is maintained. It is said that a general principle has been established that a mortgagee shall not stipulate for any collateral advantage to himself, and that there are authorities which show that. That has not been made out. I think the real principle is that the mortgagee shall not impose on the mortgagor any unconscionable or oppressive bargain. There is nothing of that kind in this case. The arrangement is for the common benefit of both parties. Though the mortgagee does by the operation of the covenant get an opportunity for the sale of his beer, the mortgagors get presumably good beer supplied upon the usual terms. It would be contrary to good sense to say that this trade contract, entered into by two business men with their eyes open, should be set aside on the ground of its being contrary to some fanciful doctrine of equity.

Then, as regards the authorities, Jennings v. Ward (1) was relied on. There there was a bill for the redemption of a mortgage, and what the Master of the Rolls said was that redemption must be decreed without regard to a certain agreement which he considered unconscionable, and which he set aside as being "unreasonable," as appears from the registrar's book which is in court. The statement by HARGREAVE, J., in Re Edwards' Estate (2), to the effect that the presumption is that a mortgagor is under pressure when he borrows money on mortgage, is not a universal principle, and that that is so is established by many authorities. The first great departure from it is to be found in the case of West India mortgages. There a mortgagee was allowed to act as consignee for the mortgagor so long as he was not mortgagee in possession. The fact was that this supposed rule, which was founded upon the dicta and not the decisions of judges, was found not to work in these cases, as the West India planters could not get the money unless they consented to the mortgagee being consignee.

Potter v. Edwards (3) is a clear authority the same way. In that case £700 was advanced, and the mortgage was for £1,000. It has been attempted, I think, to explain what was a plain transaction by a fiction, and the theory was that the parties went through a supposed payment and a repayment in the nature of commission. The real bargain was an advance of £700 and undertaking to give security for £1,000. In one sense there was an advantage to the mortgagee, as he was getting £300 and also interest on his security for £1,000. Mainland v. Upjohn (4) is another decision to the same effect.

The decision of HARGREAVE, J., in Re Edwards' Estate (2) was right, because in that case not only was there an unconscionable bargain, but the stipulation directly clogged the equity of redemption. The mortgagee in that case could either purchase part of the property or remain mortgagee, so that there was a direct clog on the redemption as, if he became the purchaser, the mortgagor had no right to redeem that part of the estate which came within the option.

It is unnecessary to add any more. In this case the covenant does not fall within any such supposed rule of equity as the defendants have contended for.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Were it not for a line of authorities, I do not think that anyone would say that this was other than a fair and reasonable arrangement. It is a contract between a brewer and a publican by which the brewer becomes the transferee of a mortgage on the licensed house, and stipulates that the publican is to take his beer from him. But it is said that mortgages have been the subject of a long series of decisions, and no doubt equity judges have tried to find some principle which would satisfactorily explain the decisions of their predecessors and those which they were about to give themselves, and it is no wonder that in doing that they sometimes laid down some general principle which when applied to other cases was too wide. The decisions were given to remedy some hard case, and then the judges afterwards tried to reduce them to a general rule which would meet all cases. In dealing with hard cases as they come one after another, the only safe thing is to do as ROMER, J., did here, and see how far the decisions have gone in each particular case.

It is clear that when a person enters into a mortgage contract he is only a borrower upon security, and any stipulation in the deed which is inconsistent with that must be treated as if it were not there. And HARGREAVE, J., in Re Edwards' Estate (2), probably had in his mind the principle that, the contract being one of loan on security, any stipulation inconsistent with that must be regarded as unfair, and be rejected. But the proposition which he laid down in such a general form, that no onerous contract entered into between the mortgagor and mortgagee as part of the agreement for the loan was valid, was not necessary for the decision of the case which he had before him, for in that case the stipulation interfered with the right of the mortgagor to redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs.

On what principle can it be said that a stipulation in a mortgage deed which does not clog the equity of redemption is invalid? I think only on the broad principle that effect will not be given to anything which is oppressive and unconscionable. In the case before us the provision is a perfectly reasonable one, and it does not make the mortgage anything but a security for a debt. The mere fact that a stipulation for the benefit of the mortgagee is contained in the mortgage deed does not necessarily make it invalid.

The only ground for saying that it does is what was said in Jennings v. Ward (1), that a man shall not have interest for his money and at the same time a collateral advantage to himself. This case is not covered by the decision in that case. There was sufficient there to warrant the judge in treating the clause as in fact an agreement for purchase at a given sum, notwithstanding that there was in form a mortgage. Nothing more than that was necessary for the determination of that case, and there is nothing here which goes so far as that. The agreement is one which does not fetter the redemption, and there is nothing unreasonable in it. I agree with the decision of ROMER, J.

SIMPSON v. GODMANCHESTER CORPORATION AND ANOTHER

The exercise, during a period extending beyond the years of prescription, continuously, openly, as a matter of right, and without interruption, by the owner of land adjacent to a river, of a practice to go on the land of another and open the sluices or locks on the river when a flood was imminent so as to protect his land and the hereditaments thereon from being flooded can constitute a good easement in law. This is so even though land not included in the dominant estate is benefited by the practice, for an easement which is serviceable and beneficial to the dominant estate does not cease to exist because its exercise by the owner of the dominant estate confers, or tends to confer, some benefit on other lands or tenements.

Easement—Prescription—Period of 40 years—Scope of Prescription Act, 1832, s. 2—Burden of proof of “consent or agreement.”

By s. 2 of the Prescription Act, 1832, where a way “or other matter” shall have been enjoyed for 40 years the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, “unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing.”

Held: (i) the section was not confined to rights of way and watercourses, but included easements of every description: opinion of ERLE, C.J., in Webb v. Bird (1) (1861), 10 C.B.N.S. 268, not approved; (ii) the burden of showing that there was a “consent or agreement” is on the party alleging it in opposition to a claim of right.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HERSCHELL, A. L. SMITH, and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1896] 1 Ch. 214, affirming a decision of WRIGHT, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, in a suit instituted by the appellant, Leonard Taylor Simpson against the respondent corporation to restrain the latter from forcing open certain locks on the river Ouse of which he claimed to be the owner as the proprietor of the navigation of that river.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Simpson for the appellant.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Methold for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

July 27, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD WATSON.—Although there is a considerable amount of evidence, oral and documentary, the material facts in this case hardly admit of dispute. The reiterated arguments of the appellant's counsel have failed to satisfy me that the inferences drawn from those facts by WRIGHT, J., and the Court of Appeal are in any respect erroneous.

By letters patent from the Crown, dated Dec. 11, 1638, certain rights of navigation in the river Ouse, between St. Ives and St. Neots, were granted to Arnold Spencer, who had previously spent considerable sums in making that part of the river navigable, and his heirs and assigns. In virtue of the powers conferred upon them, the grantees have maintained three locks upon the river, with gates or sluices, to which the present action relates, one of these being at Godmanchester, another at Houghton, and a third at Hemingford. It appears that all these locks had been erected and existed in some form or other long before the year 1689, and that they were reconstructed in an improved shape about the year 1834. It also appears that these locks, when closed, did not raise the flow of the river above the level at which it had been previously kept by old mill-dams in their vicinity, which extended across the channel. The respondents, the corporation of Godmanchester, are in that capacity the owners of lands abutting upon or adjoining the river Ouse, which are liable to be submerged when the river is in flood. Some of these lands are and have been occupied by the corporation for municipal purposes; others have been in use to be let to tenants; while between four and five hundred acres, forming the common lands of the borough, have been used and occupied, partly by the corporation, in the exercise of rights reserved to it, and partly by corporators who are burgesses of Godmanchester, and live in A commonable houses.

It is established by a large and consistent body of evidence, and it has not been seriously disputed, either in the courts below or at the Bar of the House, that the corporation have been in use, for a period extending far beyond the years of prescription, continuously, without interruption and as a matter of right, to open the gates or sluices of the locks already mentioned whenever a flood was imminent, with the object and result of permitting the flood-water to escape down the river. The appellant maintained, in argument, that the practice had its origin in, and dates from as early a period as, the year 1689. Recent evidence, going back for more than forty years, shows conclusively that the sluices were opened by the corporation for the purpose of draining or protecting those lands and tenements which are vested in them. There are a series of entries in the books of the corporation, beginning in 1736 and ending in 1893, which appear to me to show that during the whole of that period the sluices were regularly opened in time of flood, and for the same purpose as in more recent times. Prior to 1736 there are two entries, one in 1713, and another as early as 1648; and the latter of these, taken in connection with documentary evidence, to which I shall have subsequent occasion to refer, leads, in my opinion, to the inference that the practice began and was followed as matter of right by the corporation a considerable time before the year 1689. B C D

The appellant, in February, 1893, acquired by purchase the entire rights of navigation which had been granted to Arnold Spencer and his heirs and assigns by the letters patent 1638. He brought the present suit in November, 1894, and he claims an injunction to restrain the corporation, their agents, servants, and workmen, from trespassing upon, forcing open, or otherwise interfering with or injuring his locks at Godmanchester, Houghton, and Hemingford, or any one of them, and also a decree for damages. After proof had been taken the action was dismissed with costs by WRIGHT, J., whose order was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal. E

The argument addressed to us for the appellant was of a very discursive character, but the main, if I may so call them, and certainly the only, points deserving notice, which were advanced and repeated in a great variety of shapes, were these three: (i) that the right which had been exercised and is now asserted by the respondent corporation is truly in the nature of a right in gross, and cannot be the subject of a proper easement; (ii) that an easement of the nature said to have been exercised by the corporation, and such as now claimed by them, cannot be legally constituted in favour of the lands vested in the corporation as the dominant tenement, inasmuch as other lands than those of the corporation to which no such easement is attached, are benefited by its exercise; and (iii) that the exercise of the right claimed by the corporation is solely attributable to an indenture of 1689 between them and the then owner of the navigation, and that the transactions embodied in that deed constitute a personal contract which is not binding upon the appellant, who purchased for value the right of navigation without notice of its existence. F G

I failed to appreciate it at the time, and even now I am not certain that I understand, the reasoning by which the appellant endeavoured to show that the right exercised by the corporation was in the nature of an easement in gross. It was not disputed that the right to open a sluice upon the servient land of another person may be legally conferred upon the owner of a separate and dominant tenement for the purpose of enabling him to relieve his dominant lands of flood-water. In this case all these requisites are to be found. The servient estate consists of these three sluices (which the appellant maintains for the purpose of the navigation) and the navigable water upon which they operate. The dominant tenement consists of the municipal property which is vested in the respondents; and the right which they claim has, according to the evidence, invariably been exercised I in the interest and for the benefit of that estate, and not in the interest and for the benefit of any other estate or its proprietor. If the appellant had been able to show that the corporation had carried their operations beyond what was necessary to protect their own lands, so as to clear other lands of flood-water when their own were neither flooded nor threatened with inundation, the appellant would have been entitled to restrain the respondents from doing more than was reasonably necessary in order to protect their dominant lands. But he has made no such complaint; and there is no evidence in this case which would support it.

The second point appeared to me to be equally devoid of substance. It was broadly and boldly maintained that no burden imposed upon a servient tenement however beneficial to the dominant estate, can in law be regarded as an easement if its exercise for the benefit of the dominant estate has the effect of conferring some benefit upon some other land which is not included in that estate, and has no similar right of easement. In the case of many easements it is from their nature possible to confine their benefit to the dominant tenement; but in cases where the easement relates to water, or to light or air, it would be simply impossible to do so. If the law were as contended for by the appellant, a servitude of right to take water from the lands of A. for the use of the lands of B. could not be acquired either by grant or prescription, if owing to the position and levels of the lands of B. it were necessary to discharge the water or its surplus into the lands of C., to the advantage of their owner or occupant. In like manner there could be no servitude of light and air in favour of the windows of a particular house, if the maintenance of the right happened to be of some advantage to the windows of an adjoining house which did not participate in the easement. But the proposition is as destitute of foundation in authority as it is, in my opinion, unreasonable. It is no doubt one of the essential characteristics of a legal easement that its exercise shall be for the use and benefit of the dominant estate. But there is no law to the effect that an easement, which is serviceable and beneficial to that estate shall cease to exist, whenever, from the very nature of the right its exercise by the dominant estate confers, or tends to confer, some benefit upon other lands or tenements. The appellant's counsel, as might have been expected, cited no decision in support of their doctrine, and no judicial opinion in which it was discussed.

[HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the appellant's third contention and said that, in view of its terms, the deed of 1689 could not be regarded as a covenant constituting the right of the corporation, or as affording the measure of that right. It was a document which did nothing more than recognise that there was an existing right of servitude which the parties did not intend to disturb—a right resting upon continuous enjoyment by the corporation, in its own interest and that of its burgesses, in virtue of prosession which had never been disputed or resisted by the owners of the navigation, and that right had since been confirmed by unchallenged possession for more than 200 years.] I, therefore, move that the order of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed with costs. LORD HALSBURY, L.C., asks me to state that he approves of the views which I have expressed, and that he also concurs in the opinion which is about to be delivered by LORD DAVEY.

LORD SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed and this appeal dismissed. I have had an opportunity of considering not only the opinion which has now been delivered by LORD WATSON, but also that which LORD DAVEY is about to read, and I entirely adopt the grounds of judgment which are stated by those learned Lords.

LORD DAVEY.—This case is an illustration of the inconvenience arising from the laxity of pleading permitted by modern practice. If the present respondents had been obliged to state their case with legal precision in their defence, I believe that a great deal of uncertainty and expenditure of time at the trial might have been avoided. After the trial had lasted for four days it was adjourned for more than a month to enable the respondents to formulate the easement which they claimed, and it was only then that they put their claim into a formal legal shape. By their re-amended defence the respondents say that, as owners of certain hereditaments they have on their own behalf or for or on behalf of their tenants, occupiers of the said hereditaments, or on behalf of the persons entitled to rights of common on the east and west common allotments for 250 years, or for more than forty years before the acts complained of by the plaintiffs, enjoyed as of right and without interruption the right of opening and keeping open the gates of the sluices or locks at Godmanchester, Houghton, and Hemingford in time of flood, or upon every likelihood and appearance of flood, in order to prevent damage or injury to the hereditaments mentioned. And they claim such easement as well by virtue of the Prescription Act as under the deed of Dec. 3, 1689, or under a lost grant.

There is really no dispute as to the facts, and the only question is, whether in law the facts establish the title of the respondents to the easement claimed by them. That the corporation have lands part of their ancient possessions which are exposed to floods is not denied. The extracts from the books of the corporation show that from the beginning of the eighteenth century at least, and probably earlier, the corporation have been in the habit of opening the sluices to let go the water in time of flood, and on various occasions have asserted their right to do so against persons who shut down the sluice-gates which had been opened by their order. The entries relied on for the purpose of showing that it was done by permission of the owners of the navigation appear to me to indicate the contrary. In these circumstances every presumption ought to be made to support the usage. The arguments on behalf of the appellant have covered rather a wide range, and I am sure that the appellant's counsel did full justice to their client's case. In substance the appellant's points seem to be—(i) that the easement claimed by the corporation is too wide, and not sufficiently connected with the enjoyment of their lands; (ii) that it is not shown to what lands in particular it is claimed as appurtenant; and (iii) that the proper inference from the evidence is that the exercise by the corporation of the alleged easement was under the written agreement contained in the deed of 1689.

I cannot doubt that the easement, as finally alleged by the respondents, was a good easement in law. It is, in fact, a claim to divert the water which either has flooded, or, if undiverted, would flood, their lands, and to come on the appellant's land for the purpose of regulating the flow of water with that object. It appears to me directly connected with the enjoyment of the respondents' lands by the occupiers thereof. The appellant, however, argues that the right claimed is to protect, not only the respondents' lands, but the lands of other proprietors from floods. The answer is: That is not the right claimed, and we are not dealing here with any excess in the exercise of the easement, but with the question whether the corporation have the right which they claim.

The appellant's counsel quoted several cases, of which Ackroyd v. Smith (2) may be taken as an example. It was there held that you cannot annex to land rights by way of easement unconnected with the enjoyment of land as ex gratia a right of way to be used for all purposes. There is no doubt about this sound principle of law; but it appears to me to have nothing to do with the present case, in which the claim is only for the protection of the respondents' own lands. If the appellant means that the exercise by the respondents of their easement has the effect of also protecting the other lands in the district, that probably is so from the nature of the case. But it is no objection to the exercise of a lawful right, that it may indirectly benefit some other persons or subjects which do not enjoy the same right. If I have one ancient light in my house, I can prevent my opposite neighbour from building on his land so as to obstruct that window, and thereby gain the benefit of an unobstructed access of light to my other windows, which are

A modern, or my next door neighbour may be benefited by the opposite land not being built on, although he has no right. This was decided in Tapling v. Jones (3). LORD CRANWORTH there says (11 H.L.Cas. at p. 314) :

B “The plain principle seems to me to be, that no one can interfere with the absolute and indefeasible right of another, unless when such interference is made necessary by the wrongful act of the person possessing the right.”

C This easement is claimed as appurtenant to all the ancient possessions of the corporation, including the east and west common lands, all of which are more or less benefited. For the purpose of the defence it is not necessary for the respondents to say whether the easement can be claimed as appurtenant to all these lands, as it is admitted that they have some lands which are protected from flood water by the exercise of the easement. But I ought to say that I see no difficulty in the corporation prescribing, as owners of the soil of the commons (as they seem to be), on behalf of themselves and all the other persons having rights of common there. Nor do I regard the fact that the commons lie below Godmanchester Lock as presenting any difficulty. It is quite conceivable that the regulation of the flow of water through the upper lock, and the prevention of flood water above that lock, may be of the utmost importance to the lands below, and, indeed, that this is so is shown by the evidence. It is not, perhaps, very important whether the easement is claimed under the Prescription Act, 1832, or by the fiction of a lost grant. But I agree with the opinion expressed by LORD SELBORNE in Dalton v. Angus (4), that s. 2 of the Act of 1832 is not confined to rights of way and water-courses, but includes easements of every description, notwithstanding the contrary opinion expressed by ERLE, C.J., in Webb v. Bird (1).

E As this easement has been enjoyed for upwards of forty years, it is, therefore, absolute and indefeasible, to use the words of s. 2,

“unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing.”

F The appellant says that it was, and his counsel put their argument in this way. They say that the covenant contained in the deed of Dec. 3, 1689, was binding, not only upon the covenantor at law, but also in equity on every assign from him who took with notice of the covenant upon the principle of Tulk v. Moryay (5). I assume, without deciding, that this is so. But they further say that it must be presumed that every owner of the navigation before the appellant had notice of the covenant, while it is proved that the appellant bought without notice. I do not think that any such presumption ought to be made. The words of the statute are “unless it shall appear,” etc., and I think that the burden of proof is on those who set up a written consent in opposition to an absolute and indefeasible right. The appellant offered no evidence in support of his suggestion, as he perhaps might have done, by calling the late or some former owners of the navigation, and matters capable of proof ought not to be presumed. As a matter of fact, I see no reason to suppose (if one is to guess) that the deed of 1689 was either the commencement or the origin of the right claimed by the corporation, and I entirely concur with what was said by LORD WATSON on the effect and construction of that deed. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TOD HEATLEY AND ANOTHER

Nuisance—Land—Permitting foul matter to be on land—Duty of landowner—Enforcement—Injunction.

There is a duty at common law cast on the owner or occupier of land to abate a nuisance arising on the land, as where, for instance, the land becomes covered with filth, offal, and refuse. If a landowner is in breach of this duty he may, on the application of the local authority, be restrained by an injunction from allowing the land to be and to remain in such a state.

Nuisance—Statutory nuisance—Foul matter on land—Remedy—Injunction restraining landowner from allowing land to remain in such a state.

By s. 2 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, any accumulation or deposit which was a nuisance or injurious or dangerous to health was a nuisance which was liable to be dealt with summarily under the Act. Section 13 authorised the local authority to take proceedings in the High Court for the abatement of a nuisance if, in their opinion, summary proceedings would not afford an adequate remedy. Section 35 empowered the vestry to serve notice on the owner of any obnoxious matter, or the occupier of the premises on which it existed, to remove the same, and if the notice was not complied with, then to remove the matter themselves, and to recover in a summary way the expenses from the former owner of the matter removed, or from the owner or occupier of the premises. Section 138 enacted that all powers, rights, and remedies, given by the Act, should be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers, rights and remedies conferred by any other Act of Parliament, law, or custom; and all such other powers, rights, and remedies, might be exercised and put in force in the same manner and by the same authority as if the Act had not been passed.

A landowner having permitted his land to be used in such a way as to constitute a continuing nuisance.

Held: the Attorney-General on the relation of the local authority was entitled to an injunction to restrain the landowner "from allowing the land to be and to remain in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health."

F Action brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the vestry of the united parishes of St. Margaret and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from allowing a piece of land at the corner of St. Ann's Lane and Great Peter Street, Westminster, within the united parishes, to be and remain in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health.

The writ was issued on Jan. 1, 1896, against the defendant Grant Tod Heatley under the mistaken belief that he was the owner of the land, and against Henry Hayes, the tenant, a showman. The land formerly belonged to Tod Heatley, but had since come into the possession by purchase of the defendant Sir Henry Moore Brownrigg, Bart. The plaintiffs also claimed an injunction to restrain Tod Heatley from allowing the land to be used for the purposes of a fair or a show, and Hayes from so using the land.

On Jan. 11, 1896, Hayes retired from the property, and no judgment was asked as against him. The plaintiffs also gave notice to the defendant Tod Heatley that no judgment would be asked as against him, but that he might appear and ask for his costs. On Jan. 27, 1897, Brownrigg was made a defendant.

In 1882 the buildings upon the land had been pulled down, and the site was then surrounded by a hoarding. No new buildings had yet been erected there, and the plaintiffs alleged that the hoarding round the land had fallen out of repair, and that dead cats and dogs, offal, and all kinds of filth and refuse were thrown upon the land, and that persons getting through the hoarding used the land for other objectionable purposes; also that squatters with caravans had settled on the land, and that it had been and was being used by showmen, who attracted noisy, dirty and riotous crowds by playing hand organs and other loud instruments. The plaintiffs complained that the condition of the land and the uses to which it was being put were such as to constitute a serious nuisance to the inhabitants of the parishes, and to be injurious to the health of the people living near the land. It appeared that the gradual accumulation of garbage and rubbish had caused the land to be raised some two feet above the adjoining roadway, so that in wet A weather foul water poured on to it.

Under s. 13 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, the sanitary authority was empowered to take proceedings in the High Court to enforce the abatement or prohibition of a nuisance. By s. 35 notice might be served upon the owner of the premises on which obnoxious matter was, requiring him to remove the B matter and if the notice was not complied with, the sanitary authority might remove the matter and recover the expenses of so doing from the owner. The plaintiffs contended that an injunction to restrain the defendant was the sole possible remedy under the circumstances. On Jan. 11, 1896, the C agent for the defendant Brownrigg wrote to the solicitor to the vestry stating that in future no shows would be allowed on the land, but pointing out that it was impossible for the owner of the land, not being also the occupier, to prevent people from throwing refuse over the hoarding, or breaking it up, and suggesting that the vestry should send their dustmen to visit the land periodically, and keep it clean; also that they should use their influence with the police to stop the D damage to the hoarding, and the deposit of filthy matter.

The action came on for trial before KEKEWICH, J., on Nov. 24, 1896, when his Lordship said that the defendant Tod Heatley had been made a defendant in the belief that he was the owner of the land, which he was not. He must, therefore, have his costs. With regard to the defendant Brownrigg, his Lordship's view was that there was an imperative duty cast upon the owner of land not to use E his property so that it should be injurious to his neighbours, but that, having regard to the powers conferred upon the vestry by ss. 13 and 35 of the Act of 1891, and also considering the very serious outlay and difficulty that would be occasioned to the defendant if an injunction were granted in the terms asked for, his Lordship, in his discretion, declined to grant it. From that decision the plaintiffs now F appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Looking at the matter from the point of view of the public, that is to say, with reference to the duty of the defendant, and the right of the C Attorney-General, as representing the public, the case appears to me to be one of the simplest possible description. The defendant is the occupier or possessor of a vacant piece of land. I only call attention to the fact that he is occupier or possessor because we are not embarrassed here by any question such as that which arises sometimes when there is a dispute whether it is the duty of the reversioner, or tenant, or tenant for life, or somebody of that kind, to keep premises in proper F order. We are freed from that consideration. We have only got the owner of a vacant piece of land to deal with.

Is it, or is it not, a common law duty of the owner of a vacant piece of land to prevent that land from being a public nuisance? It appears to me it is a common law duty. I turn to the books to which we are accustomed to go for information about such matters as this, viz., the criminal law books, and I will take HAWKINS' I PLEAS OF THE CROWN, which is one of the best. He says in his chapter on Nuisances (8th Edn.) vol. 1 at p. 692 :

“It seems that a common nuisance may be defined to be an offence against the public, either by doing a thing which tends to the annoyance of the king's subjects, or by neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires.”

If, therefore, the owner of a piece of land does permit it to be in such a state, so smothered or covered with filth, that it is a public nuisance, he commits an

A indictable offence. He has no defence whatever to an indictment for such a public nuisance. It is no defence to say: "I did not put the filth on, but somebody else did." He must provide against this if he can. His business is to prevent his land from being a public nuisance.

B One very early authority, or illustration of that doctrine, is to be found in R. v. Watts (1). In that case (1 Salk. at pp. 356, 357) there was an "indictment for not repairing a house standing upon the highway, ruinous, and like to fall down [near the highway] which the defendant occupied, and ought to repair ratione tenuræ suæ. The defendant pleaded Not Guilty, and the jury found a special verdict, viz., that the defendant occupied, but was only tenant at will, and whether he was liable was the question."

C The court said (ibid. at p. 357):

D "The ratione tenuræ is only an idle allegation, for it is not only charged, but found, that the defendant was occupier, and in that respect he is answerable to the public; for the house was a nuisance as it stood, and the continuing the house in that condition is continuing the nuisance; and as the danger is the matter that concerns the public, the public are to look to the occupier and not to the estate, which is not material in such a case as this to the public."

E That principle has always been followed, so far as I know, in criminal cases, and also on information by the Attorney-General representing the public. I cannot, therefore, for a moment entertain the slightest doubt but that it is the common law duty of the defendant to prevent his piece of land from continuing as a public nuisance. That it is a public nuisance is beyond all controversy. There is no real question at all about that. Under the circumstances why is not the Attorney-General entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing a breach of that duty to the public? It appears to me that, unless there are instances to the contrary, which I will consider presently, it is almost a matter of course that the Attorney-General should on behalf of the public have an injunction. The mere fact that it puts the wrong-doer to expense, or that it is difficult for him to abate the nuisance, affords no defence in point of law, or any reason at all why the rights of the public should not be enforced.

F So much for the common law aspect of the case. But the common law aspect of the case is that which we are to regard by reason of s. 138 of the Act of Parliament which has been so much referred to, I mean the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, to which I will refer presently at a little more length, gives the sanitary authority, who are here the vestry, power to remove nuisances, and to clean streets, and to do all sorts of things, for the benefit of the public, and I have no doubt, under the circumstances which have been referred to, that they could proceed against the defendant criminally. But that is an extremely inconvenient mode of proceeding. They have found that so in practice. What does s. 138 say? It enacts that:

I "All powers, rights, and remedies, given by this Act shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers, rights, and remedies conferred by any Act of Parliament, law, or custom, and all such other powers, rights, and remedies may be exercised and put in force in the same manner and by the same authority as if this Act had not passed."

Attending only to the rights of the public, the Attorney-General, as representing the public, has, therefore, saved to him all his rights and all his remedies. Having regard to that section in the Act, no other section in it may oust the jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction if a proper case in other respects is made out.

What are the alleged reasons for our not interfering? They are that the vestry is empowered by this Act of Parliament to clean such places as this vacant piece of land of the defendant at the expense of the ratepayers, and even, under s. 35, at the expense of the defendant himself. I think that that is so. Let us consider upon what principle of justice can the expense of keeping the land clean be thrown upon the ratepayers. It is, as I have already said, the common law duty of the owner to prevent it from being a nuisance. Why should the ratepayers pay for it being done? There is a clause in s. 35 under which I think the vestry might have taken proceedings. That is an awkward section. It is inconvenient in practice. I do not say that it cannot be done, but it is a piece of machinery which would have to be put in force constantly, and instead of having one declaration or one injunction there would have to be a number of different orders, assuming, of course, that the defendant did not obey and perform the duty which lies upon him. It would be an extremely inconvenient procedure to have recourse to.

I think that the existence of that power ought to influence us in considering whether we should grant an injunction. Let us look at the matter from a practical point of view. The defendant takes this position which one would expect from any gentleman. He has fought for his rights. He finds the law is against him. He says: "Do not grant an injunction against me; I will make some arrangement with the vestry by which they shall keep this place clean at my expense." That was perfectly right and proper. Nobody wants to put him to greater inconvenience than necessary. Therefore, I do not think that it is necessary now, for the sake of the public or anybody else, to grant an injunction. But he must accept the consequences of being in the wrong, and that which we propose to do is to discharge the order, and make a declaration that the Attorney-General is entitled to an injunction. The defendant must pay the costs which have been incurred—not the whole costs, but the costs of the action, so far as it was dismissed against him without costs, and also the costs of this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an application by way of appeal from my brother KEKEWICH. The proceeding in the action is a proceeding by the Attorney-General at the relation of the inhabitants of the united parishes of St. Margaret and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, as represented by the vestry. The application is made to restrain a nuisance in one of those parishes, or both, on behalf of those parishes. It is proved undoubtedly that a public continuing nuisance to the danger of the inhabitants of the district exists upon the land of Sir Henry Brownrigg. The fact being absolutely proved, I need not deal with that part of the case any further. The point, however, is taken that Sir Henry Brownrigg is under no duty to abate that nuisance, and that point has been argued.

It seems to me, in addition to what my learned brother LINDLEY has said, that it is perfectly clear from one or two cases on this point, that where an owner and occupier, which Sir Henry Brownrigg is, is possessed of land, and upon it there is a continuing public nuisance which is dangerous to the health of the inhabitants, there is a duty cast upon the owner of that land to abate that nuisance. The judgment of LORD BLACKBURN in R. v. Bradford Navigation Co. (2) is very apposite to the point I am now upon. That was the case of an indictment against the company of proprietors of the Bradford Navigation for a public nuisance. I find that it was "an indictment for a public nuisance by collecting, impounding, and keeping exposed on July 1, 1864, and thence continually until Aug. 10, 1864, in the Bradford Canal, at Bradford, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, large quantities of foul liquid, filth, sewage, and polluted water."

The case was set down for trial and judgment was given for the Crown, subject to a Special Case. It was tried before MARTIN, B. The defence set up to that indictment was that a beck, which they had been allowed to take into their canal had been polluted by someone else and that it was in that way that the canal had got into the state of public nuisance for which the indictment was brought. In this state of things, BLACKBURN, J., said (6 B. & S. at p. 651) :

"There is no precise authority in point; and we must have recourse to the general principle of law. Persons who maintain their property so as to be a public nuisance are indictable."

What did Sir Henry Brownrigg do in the case now before us? Is he maintaining his property so as to be a public nuisance? Of course, he is. I have no doubt that as to this part of the case it is perfectly true that he is indictable. BLACKBURN, J., continued thus (ibid.) :

"And the question in the present case which concerns the occupiers, the lessees of the canal, is whether, they having maintained and kept part of it in such a state as to be a public nuisance, there is anything which prevents them from being indictable."

The learned judge points out that, if the statute had compelled the company to take that beck, that might be an answer to the indictment, because they would be doing what the statute compelled them to do. But he further points out that, inasmuch as the statute only authorised them to take that beck into their canal, that was no answer to the position that they were in. They had a public indictable nuisance upon their premises, and he was of opinion, like the rest of the court, that the indictment was good and held that the defendants must be convicted.

When I come to read the other case to which we have been referred, Co. of Proprietors of Margate Pier and Harbour v. Margate Town Council (3), before LUSH and HAYES, JJ., I find that there there was an indictment against the local body for having a nuisance of seaweed upon their foreshore. It was a continuing public nuisance. LUSH, J., says (20 L.T. at p. 568) :

"I have no doubt, whatever, that it is the duty of the appellants to prevent the accumulation of seaweed so that it shall not become a nuisance, and that whether produced by natural or artificial causes they are bound to remove all matter in the harbour which is a nuisance or injurious to health."

This authority, and the authority to which LINDLEY, L.J., has referred, of R. v. Watts (1), appear to me to dispose of the first point taken, namely, that there is no duty cast upon Sir Henry Brownrigg to prevent this piece of land from continuing to be a public nuisance, dangerous to health.

What is the next point that is taken? It is said that the vestry ought to have done what is required under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. But if that is the defence, does not that correspond exactly to the defence raised in R. v. Bradford Navigation Co. (2). It was raised, and this is how BLACKBURN, J., dealt with it. He said (6 B. & S. at p. 652) :

"Inconvenience to the public and to the company may be occasioned if from want of pure water the supply of water in the canal runs short, but that can afford no justification for the defendants creating a nuisance. It throws on them the necessity of taking legal steps to compel the local board of health to do their duty in cleansing the beck, or, if that be found an inefficient remedy, to obtain a private Act of Parliament for the purpose."

Supposing that the argument on behalf of Sir Henry Brownrigg was right, namely, that it was the duty of the vestry to cleanse this piece of land, what answer is that to the information of the Attorney-General, who says that there is a public nuisance on the defendant's land which he is bound to abate? None whatever, and, as BLACKBURN, J., points out, if it be in fact the duty of somebody else, it is the defendant's duty to make them perform their duty. It is no answer to the information of the Attorney-General on behalf of the public to say that somebody else ought to do the cleansing.

I doubt very much myself whether or not counsel for the defendant, with all his ingenuity, gets this cleansing within the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. Although I am not necessarily deciding it absolutely, I doubt very much whether the plaintiffs, the vestry, can be forced to do what it is contended they could be forced to do. But, be that as it may, that, as I have already pointed out, is no answer to the information of the Attorney-General, because, if you read s. 13 and s. 138 of the Act, one or the other, or both, it seems to me that the jurisdiction of the court on information by the Attorney-General is absolutely left untouched. Section 13 says,

“The sanitary authority may, if in their opinion summary proceedings would afford an inadequate remedy [which, in their opinion, in this case it does] cause any proceedings to be taken against any person in the High Court to enforce the abatement or prohibition of any nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act.”

That would seem to show their position if they go to the Attorney-General and get him to take proceedings as he has done in the present case. If not, s. 138, which I am told was not called to the attention of KEKEWICH, J., seems to me to be conclusive on the subject. Therefore, so far as this relation by the Attorney-General is concerned, we may deal with this case as if this Act had not been passed, as the legislature says. Therefore, there being this continuing public nuisance upon the land of Sir Henry Brownrigg, he is bound on the information of the Attorney-General to abate it, and an injunction ought to go. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case down to the present time Sir Henry Brownrigg has denied his liability to abate the nuisance occurring on his property. It is argued, in addition to that denial of liability, that, because the vestry also deny liability, he is to leave it in some way or other, or, at any rate, an injunction should not be granted against him.

On those points I think that he is entirely in the wrong. There is a common law liability cast on the owner or occupier of land to abate a nuisance arising upon his land; that is to say, he is bound to abate it whenever he becomes aware that there is a nuisance. Immediately he becomes aware that there is a nuisance, at once the duty arises. In some cases a man subjects himself to indictment—as, for instance, being not the owner, but a tenant at will only, as in R. v. Watts (1)—if he allows a nuisance in the shape of a dangerous thing to remain upon the land of which he is occupier. Counsel for the defendant tried to distinguish that case because of the ownership. I do not think that the tenant at will is owner in any sense, or that it makes a substantial difference. He is there as tenant at will, and there is the dangerous structure. If it falls down, it may injure someone passing by. I cannot, in point of principle, distinguish a case of dangerous structure and a nuisance in the nature of injurious effluvium that comes from the land. It seems to me, when you take the common law point of view, that there is only the alternative of allowing the nuisance to go on indefinitely or making liable the only person who can abate the nuisance, whether the owner or occupier. I have no doubt about the existence of that common law liability.

In reference to the next point, that the position is altered by the statute, reading s. 138—which by the way does not appear to have been called to KEKEWICH, J.'s attention—it appears to me that that argument, without further inquiry, must fail. The statute says that you are to have the same remedies as though the Act had never been passed—that is to say, you are to have all your common law remedies as though this statute, at any rate, was not in existence. That means that you are to disregard for the purpose of remedy everything that there is in this statute. I do not mean to say, if it were clearly shown that the vestry had been acting in a vexatious manner, that that might not be taken into consideration. I asked for any clear admission that had ever been made by Sir Henry Brownrigg that he was liable, and there is none to be found.

Under these circumstances we do not need to consider the difficulty in which he may be placed if an injunction is granted. He has not tried to do anything practicable to get rid of this nuisance. He has based his defence upon the ground that he is not liable, and that the vestry is. Seeing that we may expect a man of his position to realise what is reasonable—there are decided cases against him—being assured that the vestry have the matter under their consideration, and seeing that both sides are not unlikely to come to a reasonable settlement of the difficulty now that the rights are established, I think that declaring the Attorney-General entitled to an injunction, and giving liberty to apply, is the best way of settling the contention. No doubt it will lead to something which will render an injunction unnecessary.

Re HOLLIS' HOSPITAL TRUSTEES AND HAGUE'S CONTRACT

47 W.R. 691; 43 Sol. Jo. 644]

Perpetuities—Common law condition—Charitable trust—Reverter clause—Operation if property applied for other than trust purposes.

Sale of Land—Title—Doubtful title—Title not to be forced on purchaser.

By indentures of lease and release of May 18, 1726, certain hereditaments were assured to one J. W. to have and to hold unto the said J. W. his heirs and assigns to the use of one T. H., sen., and certain other persons therein named, being the trustees of a charity known as H.'s Hospital upon the trusts therein mentioned for the maintenance and management of the hospital, subject to the following proviso: "Provided always, and it is hereby agreed by and between the said parties to these presents, that if at any time hereafter the premises hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, or the rents, issues, and profits of the same, or of any part thereof, shall be employed or converted to or for any other use or uses, intention or purposes, than as are hereinbefore mentioned and specified, then and from thenceforth all and every the buildings, lands, and premises hereinbefore conveyed to the uses and upon the trusts hereinbefore mentioned shall revert to the right heirs of the said T. H., sen., party hereto, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding." One E. H. had entered into a contract with an agent acting for the majority of the trustees of the charity for the purchase of a portion of their freehold property. E. H. was willing to accept the title and a draft conveyance had been approved, when one of the trustees wrote to E. H.'s solicitors, stating in effect that, as heir-at-law of T. H., sen., he had not concurred in the sale of the property, and calling attention to the above reverter clause in the title deeds. E. H. took out this summons against the trustees asking for a declaration that a good title had not been shown to the hereditaments contracted to be sold.

Held: the proviso constituted a common law condition subsequent; the rule against perpetuities applied to such a condition; and the title was not one which should be forced on a purchaser.

Vendor and Purchaser Summons.

By indentures of lease and release dated Aug. 26 and 27, 1703, Thomas Hollis (father of Thomas Hollis, sen.), of his charitable mind and disposition to the intent to find and provide habitations for sixteen poor persons from time to time and for ever to be elected of the poor of Sheffield or within two miles round as thereby directed and to raise moneys necessary for keeping the fabric in which such habitations were made at all times thereafter in repair, conveyed certain hereditaments in Sheffield then converted into sixteen small apartments or habitations, with other hereditaments to certain persons therein named, their heirs and assigns for ever to their use and behoof upon trust and subject to the powers, declarations, and agreements therein mentioned and expressed. By an indenture of assignment dated Jan. 24, 1704, Thomas Hollis, the father, assigned to Thomas Hollis, sen., his executors, administrators and assigns, certain government terminable annuities amounting to £90 per annum and by deed poll, dated Jan. 26, 1704, Thomas Hollis, sen., declared that the same annuities were so assigned to him upon trust that he should pay the same towards maintaining the almshouses and for several other purposes in the said deed mentioned. By a writing or codicil under his hand and seal, dated Feb. 21, 1715, annexed to the deed of assignment of Jan. 24, 1704, Thomas Hollis, the father, revoked several payments in that deed contained, and left his son, Thomas Hollis, sen., liberty to continue or discontinue them as he, his executors, or administrators, should think fit, without being accountable to any.

Thomas Hollis, the father, died, and the before-mentioned annuities were turned into South Sea Annuities and South Sea Stock, which annuities and stock were sold by Thomas Hollis, sen., for £1,500. Thomas Hollis, sen., for the augmentation of the charities and for the better settlement thereof, added to the £1,500 the sum of

A £610, and with those two sums purchased certain messuages, lands, and tenements from Sir John Statham and Thomas Turner. At the date of the next mentioned indentures the hereditaments originally conveyed by the indentures of lease and release of August, 1703, had become legally vested in Thomas Hollis, sen., and ten other persons (including Thomas Hollis, the younger), by way of survivorship or otherwise. By indenture of lease for a year, dated May 17, 1726, and made between B Thomas Hollis, sen., of the one part, and John Williams, of the other part, Thomas Hollis, sen., in consideration of 5s., bargained and sold the hereditaments so purchased by him from Sir John Statham and Thomas Turner (which included the property comprised in the contract, the subject of the present application) to John Williams, to have and to hold unto John Williams, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the day next before the day of the date of that indenture for a year at a peppercorn rent if demanded, to the intent and purpose that by virtue of that deed and of the statute for transferring of uses into possession John Williams might be in the actual possession of all and singular the premises aforesaid, and be thereby enabled to accept a grant and release of the reversion and inheritance thereof to him, his heirs and assigns, for ever, to and for such uses, trusts, intents, and purposes as in and by such release should be limited, expressed, and declared concerning the same. There was a similar indenture of lease to John Williams mutatis mutandis by the then trustees of the almshouses and premises comprised in the release of 1703.

By an indenture dated May 18, 1726, and made between Thomas Hollis, sen., of the first part, the ten named persons (including Thomas Hollis the younger) therein mentioned (being the ten persons in whom, jointly with Thomas Hollis, sen., the property originally devoted to charity by the father of Thomas Hollis, sen., was then legally vested) of the second part, John Williams, of the third part, and Isaac Hollis, William Stead, Daniel Bridges and John Crooks, of the fourth part, after reciting the deeds and matters before referred to, it was witnessed that for the support and maintenance of the charity, and for the better accomplishment and performance of the trusts and powers in them reposed by former conveyances, Thomas Hollis, sen., and the ten persons parties of the second part, nominated, elected, and chose the four persons parties of the fourth part, to be trustees, to be added to the surviving trustees, in the room of such others of the trustees as were dead, and it was further witnessed that in consideration of 5s., a price to the old trustees paid by John Williams, the old trustees granted, aliened, released, and confirmed unto G John Williams (in his actual possession of the tenements and hereditaments next thereafter mentioned, then being by force of bargain and sale for one year bearing date the day before the date of that indenture in consideration of money and by force of the statute for transferring of uses into possession) and to his heirs the hereditaments by the indenture of release of August, 1703, conveyed by Thomas Hollis (father of Thomas Hollis, sen.), to hold unto Thomas Williams, his heirs and H executors for ever, to the use and behoof of Thomas Hollis, sen., and the fourteen other persons, the old and new trustees, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon the trusts and to and for the several and respective uses, intents, and purposes thereafter limited, expressed and declared of and concerning the same. And it was thereby further witnessed that Thomas Hollis, sen., for the better support and maintenance of the charity and for the augmentation thereof, and in consideration of I 5s. paid by John Williams, granted, aliened, released, and confirmed (in his actual possession of the hereditaments thereafter mentioned, then being by force and virtue of the indenture of bargain and sale for one year, bearing date the day next before the date of that indenture in consideration of money and by force of the statute for transferring of uses into possession) and to his heirs, all the hereditaments purchased by Thomas Hollis, sen., from Sir John Statham and Thomas Turner, to have and to hold unto John Williams, his heirs and assigns for ever, to the use and behoof of Thomas Hollis, sen., and the other old and new trustees, their heirs and assigns for ever, nevertheless upon the several and respective trusts, and to and for the several respective intents and purposes thereafter limited, expressed, and declared of and concerning the same.

Then followed a declaration of the trusts of all the hereditaments conveyed to the effect that the old and new trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, their heirs and assigns, or the heirs and assigns of such survivor, should place and put sixteen poor persons that should be of the age of fifty years at least and single, of the town of Sheffield or within two miles round, in the sixteen apartments or dwellings (being the hereditaments originally conveyed by Thomas Hollis, the father of Thomas Hollis, sen.), with divers provisions for the government of the charity, and filling up vacancies, and upon this further trust that they, the old and new trustees, their heirs and assigns, or the major part of them, their heirs or assigns, should pay, apply, employ, and lay out the rents, issues, and profits of all and singular the premises thereinbefore granted and released as therein mentioned for the benefit of the objects of the charity, including paying a schoolmaster and schoolmistress for the teaching of fifty poor artificers' and tradesmen's children, and that they the trustees should lay out and expend such other parts of the rents, issues, and profits that should or might arise or grow out of the thereby granted and released premises in the necessary support and reparations of the tenements and apartments and what could be spared thereof (if any) to be kept in store against any extraordinary occasion for repairing, or to be laid out in such other manner as the trustees or the major part of them, their heirs or assigns, should think fit. Then followed provisions for the appointment of new trustees, for keeping accounts, for laying out the balance, with power to deduct out of the rents, issues, and profits £5 to defray charges of keeping and settling accounts, and to eat and drink in commemoration of the benefactors of the charity.

Then was the provision upon which the question in the present case arose :

"Provided always, and it is hereby declared and agreed by and between the said parties to these presents, that if at any time hereafter the premises hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, or the rents, issues, and profits of the same, or of any part thereof, shall be employed or converted to or for any other use or uses, intention or purposes, than as are hereinbefore mentioned and specified, then and from thenceforth all and every the buildings, lands, and premises hereinbefore conveyed to the uses and upon the trusts hereinbefore mentioned shall revert to the right heirs of the said Thomas Hollis, sen., party hereto, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

There followed certain powers for Thomas Hollis, sen., during his life, and after his decease for John Hollis, Thomas Hollis, jun., Isaac Hollis, and Richard Solby, four of the trustees (being probably all related to Thomas Hollis, sen.), and the survivors and survivor of them at any time or times during their lives or the life of the survivors or survivor of them to nominate the persons to receive the benefit of the almshouses, and to appoint schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, and a power for Thomas Hollis, sen., in his lifetime to revoke, add, alter, or diminish all or any of the charities or sums thereinbefore appointed in such manner as he should see fit, and a power for the trustees to pay their costs, charges, and expenses, and to lease for terms not exceeding twenty-one years, and to lease certain closes purchased of Thomas Turner for 800 years or any less term to build on, and a covenant with John Williams, his heirs and assigns, against incumbrances.

By an agreement dated Oct. 3, 1898, a contract was entered into by an agent acting on behalf of a majority of the trustees of Hollis' Hospital, to sell to Ernest Hague certain freehold property, situate at Castle Dye, near Sheffield, containing 25a. 1r. 17p., for £5,750. Matters had proceeded so far that the purchaser was satisfied to accept the title, and the draft conveyance had been approved by the trustees' solicitor, when a letter, dated Nov. 16, 1898, was received by the purchaser's solicitors, written by William Henry Anthony, one of the trustees who had not concurred in the sale, to the effect that as the heir-at-law of Thomas and John Hollis, he thought it his duty to intimate to them that he was no party to the sale of the property, and to call their attention to the clause in the title deeds as to the property reverting to the heir-at-law, in case of its being devoted to any other purpose than that intended by the settler. This summons was taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 [repealed by Law of Property Act, 1925], by Ernest Hague, for the purpose of determining whether or not a good title had been shown. W. H. Anthony declined to appear with his co-trustees upon the summons.

July 5, 1899. BYRNE, J., after stating the facts, continued.—It is contended on behalf of the purchaser that a good title cannot be made by reason of the clause in the deed of May 18, 1726, providing for the reverter to the right heirs of Thomas Hollis, sen., inasmuch as the sale will be a breach of the condition, and, alternatively, that the title shown is not one which ought to be forced upon a purchaser. It is contended, on behalf of the vendors, that is, the trustees other than W. H. Anthony, that the condition is void as tending to a perpetuity, and that, whether the clause in question be construed as operating by way of shifting use, as they say it should be, or by way of condition subsequent.

The effect of the method of conveyance adopted was as follows. The lease for a year operated, and the bargainee, John Williams, was in possession by the Statute of Uses. The release operated by enlarging the estate or possession of the bargainee to a fee. This was at the common law and the use being declared in favour of persons other than the bargainee the statute again intervened and annexed or transferred the possession of the release to the use of the trustees to whom the use was declared: see BUTLER'S NOTES TO COKE UPON LITTLETON (18th Edn.) 272a, note vi. 2. I think the clause about which the contest arises is, in terms and form, a true express common law condition subsequent, being aptly worded, and being in favour of the heirs of Thomas Hollis, sen. It is true that words of an express condition may in certain cases be intended as a limitation, and the rule is that it shall not ordinarily be so construed, and there does not appear to be any reason in the present case why it should be construed as a limitation rather than a condition: see SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE (7th Edn.), by PRESTON, p. 124, note 16. It was conceded in argument that, if the clause in question ought to be construed as a limitation or as creating a shifting or springing use, it would be void as infringing the rule against perpetuities, and it was argued that the clause ought to be construed as one intended to shift the use which was vested by virtue of the release in the trustees upon the happening of the contemplated event in the heirs of the original bargainor, and that it was not possible for it to operate otherwise, having regard to the fact that the estate to be defeated was one existing only by virtue of the statute. I do not think that this argument can prevail. It is laid down in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, p. 120, that a condition may be annexed to a limitation of uses and thereby the same (viz., the uses or estates arising from the uses) may be made void, to which statement a note is appended by Mr. PRESTON:

“and shall be executed by statute 27 Hen. 8, so that the donor and his heirs may take advantage of the condition, Sav. 77. See further in Vin. Abr. Condition (N.).”

In Rudhall's Case (1), William Rudhall, Serjeant-at-law, being cestui que use in fee, devised certain lands before the Statute of Uses by his will in writing to Charles his younger son and the heirs male of his body with remainder to John his eldest son in fee, with the condition that neither the said Charles nor any of his heirs of his body should aliene or discontinue any of the said lands, but only to the jointure of his wife for the time being and for the use of the said jointures of the said wives A of the said heirs for term of lives of the said wives. And after the said William Rudhall died, and Charles his son entered and after the year 4 Edw. 6 by his indenture leased the land to the defendants for term of their lives rendering the ancient rent to him, his heirs and assigns. Then, 1 Eliz., the said Charles levied a fine to certain persons and their heirs with proclamations, which was to the use of the said Charles and Alice his wife, and the heirs male of the body of Alice by him begotten, B and for default of such issue, to the use of the heirs of the said Charles begotten, and for default of such issue, to the use of the right heirs of the said William Rudhall, the father. And it was averred that the use of this fine was for the jointure of the said Alice for term of her life. And the plaintiff, as heir of Serjeant Rudhall, entered for the condition broken. And in this case three doubts arising, one, if it was condition or limitation of estate in use; another, if the condition was broken; and C the third, if the heir of the cestui que use should take advantage of condition broken by the Statute of Uses. And it appears that this is condition, because condition destroys the estate and returns the land to the donor and his heirs; and limitation of estate is when the first estate is destroyed, and new estate limited by way of remainder or otherwise. And here is condition, because there is not a new estate limited over, but the estate to which it is annexed is destroyed, and then arises for consideration if the condition is broken; and it appears that lease for lives of the defendants, reserving the ancient rent being made according to the statute, is not a discontinuance. For the statute has given power to make such estates that they are legal, and legal estates cannot make injurious discontinuances. Therefore, the condition in this respect is not broken, but the limitation of other uses by which other heirs are inheritable than were at first, is to break the condition. For the limitation of use on fine in special tail is contrary to the will of Serjeant Rudhall, and the limitation of the fee to the heirs of Serjeant Rudhall is other limitation to heirs than as he himself limits, for he limits the fee to John Rudhall, his eldest son and his heirs, and it might be that John Rudhall and his heirs are heirs of the half blood to the direct heirs of Serjeant Rudhall, whence it is other inheritance than as was in the first limitation which is breach of the condition. And as to the taking advantage of condition annexed to the use, it appears that the Statute of Uses has given this advantage when the uses and possessions are united, that the heir of the father enter, by which it appears by the opinion of all the justices that the entry was allowable, and the plaintiff shall recover. And it was adjudged that his entry was allowable, for the condition was broken by limitation of use in special tail and of the other remainder in fee in the heirs of the father; but lease for life according to the statute is not discontinuance, and therefore no breach of condition. Also this entry for condition is guaranteed (?) by the Statute of Uses, and also it was agreed that this was condition and not limitation. I have translated the report out of the Law French, and I think that the case (which is also reported, MOORE 212 and LEONARD 298) is an authority for the statement in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE.

The next question is whether or not the condition, being an express common law condition subsequent, is void for perpetuity. I have not been referred to any case deciding the question, nor have I since the argument, after a considerable search, been able to find any authority in the reports enabling me to say that the point has ever been judicially decided. For the exposition of our very complicated real property law it is proper in the absence of judicial authority to resort to text-books I which have been recognised by the court as representing the views and practice of conveyancers of repute. Except in the comparatively recent, although most valuable book, of MR. CHALLIS, to which I shall have to refer more fully later on, I cannot find any definite statement of opinion adverse to the views expressed by MR.
SANDERS and by MR. LEWIS in their well-known treatises, and I will first refer to SANDERS ON USES AND TRUSTS (5th Edn.) vol. 1, at pp. 206, 207, and also at p. 213.
[His LORDSHIP read the passages and continued:] I find in LEWIS ON PERPETUITY the opinion of the learned author expressed in clear and unambiguous language.

A [His LORDSHIP referred to pp. 615, 616, of the edition of 1843, and continued:] Among quite modern text writers I find a similar expression of opinion: see the work of the learned American authority MR. GRAY, who has written on the LAW OF PERPETUITY, at p. 215, where he states his view in spite of the fact that there are American authorities tending the other way, the point not having been taken or argued in such authorities, and see also MARSDEN ON PERPETUITIES, at p. 4.

B I have purposely avoided referring to certain dicta in recent cases until I come to examine MR. CHALLIS' argument, which was in fact the basis of the argument put forward on the part of the purchaser in the present case. That argument and the learned author's expression of opinion are to be found at pp. 174, 175, 176, 177, of CHALLIS ON REAL PROPERTY (2nd Edn.). [His LORDSHIP read the passage and continued:] Pausing at the introductory paragraphs, I do not propose to embark upon a consideration of the origin and development of the rule or rules against perpetuities about which there has been and will continue to be grave differences of opinion among real property lawyers. I find a clear and well-recognised rule certainly applicable to all ordinary methods of disposition in vogue since the Statute of Uses, and what I have to do is to see whether or not that rule applies to prevent the effectuating by means of a common law condition what is forbidden by the law in the case of all other methods of disposition of property. MR. CHALLIS is right, of course, when he says that when any part of the common law requires amendment the legislature alone is competent to apply the remedy. But the courts have first to find what is the common law, that is, the principle embodied in what is called the common law, and to apply it to new and ever-varying states of facts and circumstances. The common law is to be sought in the expositions and declarations of it in the decisions of the courts and in the writings of lawyers. New statutes and the course of social development give rise to new aspects and conditions, which have to be regarded in applying the old principles. The policy of the law against the creation of perpetuities was certainly asserted at a very early date, as was also the policy of discountenancing restraints upon alienation. I may give, by way of illustration, what was said by LORD MACNAGHTEN, in Nordenfjelt v. Maxim Nordenfjelt Guns and Ammunition Co. (2). [1894] A.C. at pp. 564, 565. [His LORDSHIP read the passage, and continued:]

E Might it not be said from MR. CHALLIS' point of view that if it was the common law in the reign of Queen Elizabeth that all restraints of trade, general or partial, were void, that they must still be void? The answer appears to be that the principle was that restraints of trade are contrary to public policy, and that is the principle still. It is the application of it that has varied. An illustration of a void condition, because impossible of fulfilment, is given in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, p. 133, viz., if one give or grant land on condition that a man shall go to Rome in eight days. That which was impossible at the time when the illustration was given has now become possible owing to a change of circumstances, and, though the old principle stands, the application of it has changed. In reference to the suggestion as to devising a novel restriction to be applied to novel forms of limiting, etc., I may point out that in the present case the object of the grantor could not have been obtained without adopting a novel form of assurance. He wanted to vest the estate in himself jointly with others. It is right to mention that the present case being one of a gift for charitable purposes, the question could not have arisen had the deed been dated ten years later than it was, having regard to the provisions of the Charitable Uses Act, 1735, which provides that the gift or conveyance must be without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, clause or agreement whatsoever, for the benefit of the donor or grantor or of any person or persons claiming under him. I think that some of MR. CHALLIS' criticisms of the dicta of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Macleay (3), are not quite reasonable. The use of the expression "tenant in tail," at p. 190 of the LAW REPORTS is an obvious slip either verbal or clerical for "tenant in fee," as is clear by reference to p. 187, where the learned judge says:

“Looking at the will, I have no doubt that there is a condition annexed to the gift in fee,” A and this is followed in the next sentence by the remark :

“First of all, it is to be observed that the condition, good or bad, is confined within legal limits; it is applicable merely to the devisee himself, and therefore is not void on any ground of remoteness.” B

This being so, I find in the passage I have read, coupled with the passage at p. 190, referred to by MR. CHALLIS, a clear expression of opinion by SIR GEORGE JESSEL that, had the condition in question not been limited in point of time, as it was, it would have been void for remoteness. The decision of NORTH, J., in Dunn v. Flood (4) (25 Ch.D. 629) as to the remoteness of the power of re-entry in that case was obiter in the sense that it was unnecessary for the purposes of the decision to determine it, although it was a question raised and argued; but I think that MR. CHALLIS, in saying that nothing was said or offered to support the obiter dictum, appears to have overlooked the observation of BAGGALLAY, L.J., where he says (28 Ch.D. at p. 592) : C

“This right of re-entry was held by NORTH, J., to be void for remoteness. We have not heard the counsel for the defendant, but I am at present advised, I concur with NORTH, J., that this right could not be enforced, being void under the rule against perpetuities.” D

I must also notice that MR. CHALLIS makes no reference whatever to the opinions of SANDERS and LEWIS which I have quoted. The result appears to be that there are expressions of opinion by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, NORTH, J., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., and the opinions of two great real property lawyers and text writers in favour of the invalidity of such a condition as the one in question, besides the opinions of two modern text writers, while on the other hand, there is nothing definite except the opinion and reasoning of MR. CHALLIS in his work on Real Property. It is to be noticed that MR. CHALLIS puts forward the surmise that at the present day the courts would not acquiesce in the conclusion he draws without great reluctance, and in reference to his appeal to arguments to be derived from history, I may refer to his own observations at p. 394. E

I am of opinion that the condition in question is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities. But this still leaves another question for consideration, viz.: Is the title one which ought to be forced upon a purchaser? The rule which should be followed in such cases is that stated by CHITTY, L.J., in Re Thackuray and Young's Contract (5) (40 Ch.D. at pp. 38, 39, 40). I have not in the present case any decisions or dicta of judges to lead me to a contrary conclusion to that to which I have come, and the question is one of general law upon which I have dicta of eminent judges and opinions of text writers of authority which I consider justify the view I have expressed. At the same time, the point is one of some obscurity and difficulty, and one which cannot be said to have been the subject of direct judicial decision. Moreover, regard must be had to the fact that the person claiming to be heir-at-law of Thomas Hollis, sen., has given a notice which must be taken to be notice of his intention to claim the benefit of the breach of condition, if broken, and he has declined to argue, or to be bound by the present decision, so that the purchaser, if he completes, will be in danger of immediate litigation, an element which must have very great weight in considering whether or not the title ought to be forced on a purchaser: see Pegler v. White (6), and FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (3rd Edn.), p. 408. Upon a consideration of all the circumstances, I do not think I ought to say that such a title has been shown as ought to be forced upon the purchaser, if he is unwilling to complete. F

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN GONTY AND MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAIL. CO.

45 W.R. 83; 12 T.L.R. 617]

Compulsory Purchase—Railway—Part of land required by railway—Right of acquirement where severance possible without material detriment to remainder—Determination of existence of material detriment—Matters to be taken into account—Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict., c. lxxix), s. 42—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict., c. 20), s. 68.

A railway company's private Act, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts and Part 1 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, provided that the owners of factories specified in the schedule whereof parts only should be required for the purposes of the Act might be required to sell to the company such parts only, without the company being compellable to purchase the whole or any greater portion of the premises, if such parts could, in the opinion of the authority to whom the question of disputed compensation might be submitted, be "severed from the remainder of such properties without material detriment thereto." The company gave notice to treat for a portion of the premises of one of these factories which included the only access from a public highway to the remainder of the premises. This land was required merely for the purpose of building a railway viaduct across it. Before the umpire to whom the question of compensation was submitted, the company undertook to grant to the owner of the factory a perpetual right of way under one of the arches of the viaduct, then in course of erection, which would give him practically the same access to the remainder of his premises as he had enjoyed before.

Held: in deciding whether severance of the acquired land could take place without material detriment to the remainder of the property the umpire was entitled to take into account all the circumstances, including the nature of the proposed use by the railway of the acquired land, the obligation of the company under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to provide an accommodation way for the owner of the acquired land and (per LORD ESHER, M.R.), the undertaking by the company to grant a perpetual right of way which (per LORD ESHER, M.R., and A. L. SMITH, L.J.) they had power to grant.

Appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (POLLOCK, B., and BRUCE, J.) upon a Special Case stated by the umpire in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Acts.

In March, 1895, the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co., acting under their private Act, the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Act, 1893, served upon the plaintiff a notice to treat for the purchase of a part of a factory owned by him at Leicester. By the Act of 1893, the Lands Clauses Acts and Part 1 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, were incorporated in the Act, and it was also provided as follows : D

"Section 42. Whereas in the construction of the railways and works hereby authorised or otherwise in exercise of the powers of this Act it may happen that portions only of the houses or other buildings or manufactories shown on the deposited plans may be sufficient for the purposes of the same, and that such portions may be severed from the remainder of the said properties without material detriment thereto : therefore notwithstanding s. 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the owners of and other persons interested in the houses or other buildings or manufactories described in the schedule to this Act and whereof parts only are required for the purposes of this Act may, if such portions can in the opinion of the jury, arbitrators or other authority to whom the question of disputed compensation shall be submitted be severed from the remainder of such properties without material detriment thereto, be required to sell and convey to the company the portions only of the premises so required without the company being obliged or compelled to purchase the whole or any greater portion thereof, the company paying for the portions required by them, and making compensation for any damage sustained by the owners thereof and other parties interested therein by severance or otherwise. . . ." E F G

The plaintiffs' factory was one of those described in the schedule to the Act.

The amount of compensation to be paid by the railway company was disputed, H and the matter was submitted to arbitration. In September, 1895, the arbitrators appointed an umpire, who in February, 1896, made his award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court in which he stated that the only means of access for vehicles to the factory from a public highway was from a public highway called Bath Lane, and that this access was included in the portion of land required by the company. The Special Case then contained the following paragraphs : I

"(3.) If the company take the portion of the said land comprised in the said notices to treat given under s. 42 aforesaid there will be no access for vehicles to and from the said land from and to Bath Lane aforesaid, except over the land so taken by the company. (4.) The company's railway is carried over the portion of the said land for which notices to treat have been given by a viaduct which is in course of construction . . . and sufficient access for vehicles to and from the remainder of the said land, from and to Bath Lane aforesaid, can be provided

A through an archway of the said viaduct. The sole purpose for which the railway company will use, or are likely to use, the land is to carry the viaduct over which the running lines of the company pass, and no other, and save for letting out for non-railway purposes, the company are not likely to require any further or other use of the land. (5.) The company contended that the provision of such B access was an accommodation work, which in the event of their taking the said portion of land, they would be bound to make and maintain under s. 68 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and (whether they would or would not be so bound) they offered and undertook by their counsel to make and at all times thereafter maintain for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers
 C of the said remainder of the said land such an access to and from the same from and to Bath Lane aforesaid, by means of a roadway under one of the arches of the said viaduct as shown on the plan annexed hereto, and being of the full height and width of such arch, and having a gradient of not more than one in eighteen, and to execute any assurance necessary to secure to the owners a perpetual easement of such right of passage under such viaduct from and to such land. (6.) The landowner contended that in determining under s. 42 of the D company's said Act whether the said portions of the said land could be severed from the remainder thereof without material detriment thereto, I was bound to consider only the effect which the taking of the said portions required by the company and the severing of the same from the remainder would have upon such remainder, and that I was not authorised by the Act to take into consideration any offers, whether of works, easements, or other matters made by E the company with the object of neutralising such effect; and the landowner further contended that the company could not in law fulfil their undertaking to convey the said easement in perpetuity; and lastly, it was contended that, even if such access was provided for the owner, there would still be material detriment to the remainder of the said property. (7.) I heard this question before taking evidence as to value, and after hearing counsel and evidence thereon I decided as follows: (i) If the land taken by the company under their notice to treat prevents all access to the claimant's works through or under the viaduct, the F company must purchase the entire property. (ii) If the company have power to give the access offered by their counsel through the archway, which has been constructed, from the street to the claimant's yard, I hold that there is not such material detriment to the property as to entitle the claimant to claim that the G company must purchase the whole. (iii) Believing that there is nothing to prevent the roadway offered by the company from being accepted by the claimant as a means of access, I propose to hear the parties on that basis as to the compensation to be paid by the company for the land they take, and for the damage sustained by the claimant in consequence thereof."

H The umpire then made an alternative award on the basis of the two contentions of the plaintiff and the company, and proposed the following question for the opinion of the court: Was I entitled to take into consideration the matters mentioned in paras. 5, 6 and 7, in forming an opinion whether the said portion of the land could be severed from the remainder thereof without material detriment thereto?

By s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, it is provided:

I "The company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway; (that is to say,) Such and so many convenient gates, bridges, arches, culverts, and passages over, under, or by the sides of or leading to or from the railway as shall be necessary for the purpose of making good any interruptions caused by the railway to the use of the lands through which the railway shall be made; and such works shall be made forthwith after the part of the railway passing over such lands shall have been laid out or formed, or during the formation thereof. . . ."

The Queen's Bench Division (POLLOCK, B., and BRUCE, J.) were of opinion that, in considering whether any material detriment would be caused by the severance, the umpire was not entitled to take into consideration the undertaking given by the company, and that s. 68 was not applicable to the case of a factory. The company appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I think that s. 42 of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Act, 1893, ought to be construed in such a way as to meet the grievance which existed as the law stood before the passing of that Act. Under s. 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, if a railway company took compulsorily even the smallest portion of a house or factory, it was left to the option of the landowner to compel the company to purchase the whole of the house or factory, although the severance would cause no material detriment to the remainder. It was a serious grievance, because it practically prevented railway companies from carrying on their undertakings in the best way for the good of the public. How was that grievance met by s. 42? The section seems to me to take away from a landowner, unless certain conditions are fulfilled, the power of compelling a railway company which has taken a portion of his house or factory to take the whole.

Who is to say whether those conditions are fulfilled or not? Not the landowner, but the tribunal to whom the question of disputed compensation shall be submitted. That tribunal, either arbitrators or jury, or as the case may be, is directed by s. 42 to decide whether, assuming that the acquired portion of land is taken, the taking of it will cause material detriment to the remainder. If it should decide that no material detriment will be thereby caused, then the landowner is deprived of the power granted by s. 92 of compelling the railway company to take more land than is included in their notice to treat. Considering that s. 42 of the special Act is intended to meet an acknowledged grievance on the part of railway companies, it seems to me that the court should construe it as largely as it reasonably can in order to meet that grievance. I am, therefore, of opinion that the arbitrators or the jury, as the case may be, are entitled under the section to take into account all the circumstances and the mode and manner in which the piece of land required by the company is to be taken.

The landowner in the present case contended that the taking by the railway company of the piece of land which they required was detrimental to his factory, because it cut off from the factory all access to a public highway. The answer of the railway company was that they did not propose to take the land so as to cut off that access to the factory. They undertook by counsel before the umpire to enter into a binding obligation by deed to grant to the landowner, in the place of his former access to his factory, a perpetual easement and right of way under the railway exactly equivalent to, or which should in the opinion of the umpire be the equivalent of, his original access. But there is more than that. The company are carrying their railway on a viaduct over the piece of land which they propose to take, and one of the arches of the viaduct will go across the road now being used by the landowner as access to his factory. That archway will be so high and so wide and the gradients of the road underneath it will be altered, if at all, so slightly, that anyone would say that the road over which it is proposed to grant a perpetual right of way will be practically identical with that which the landowner is now using.

These being the facts, it seems to me that no unbiased person could honestly say that any real detriment was being caused to the remainder of the factory. It was argued that the umpire could not take into account the way in which the company propose to take this piece of land, but it seems to me that to allow that argument would be to do away altogether with the benefit intended to be given by s. 42. In the next place it was contended that the railway company have no power in law to grant this perpetual right of way. If such a grant were inconsistent with the purposes for which the piece of land is being taken, that is to say, if it were inconsistent with the purposes of the railway, then the company would have no power to make it, and if they had no power in law to make the grant, I think that the umpire could not properly take into account the undertaking which they have given. But with the exception of Mulliner v. Midland Rail. Co. (1), the cases that have been cited, and in particular Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Petty (2), are direct authorities that the railway company has power in law to grant the proposed right of way, because the grant will not be inconsistent with any purpose for which they are taking the land on which the right of way is to be given. I, therefore, think that, in giving this undertaking before the umpire, the company have entered into an obligation to carry it out which would be enforced if necessary by the court.

There is another point that has been discussed. I think that under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the railway company could be compelled to carry out, quite apart from their undertaking, the very same works which they have undertaken to execute. However, I desire to say that I base my decision upon the undertaking given by the company, and my answer to the question put by the umpire would be the same if no such section as s. 68 had existed. The fact of the matter coming within s. 68 only makes the case stronger. I think that the umpire was entitled to take into account the mode in which the railway was to be carried across the piece of land taken by the company and also the undertaking given by them. Taking that into account, he was entitled to say that the severance of the piece of land in question would not cause any material detriment to the remainder of the plaintiff's factory. Under these circumstances the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the umpire was entitled to take into account, in considering the question of material detriment, the fact that the works executed or about to be executed by the company would leave an access to the landowner's premises which would be, if not exactly the same, at least similar to that which he formerly had. If it had not been for s. 42 of the special Act, the railway company could have been compelled by the landowner under s. 92 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to take the whole of this factory. But by s. 42 it is provided that he shall no longer have that power of compelling the company to purchase more land than they want, unless he can satisfy the tribunal that has to decide the amount of compensation to be paid by the company that the severance proposed will cause material detriment to the remainder of the property.

How is that tribunal, which in the present case is an umpire, to decide whether the severance will cause material detriment to the remainder? The first thing is to find out how the severance is to take place. The umpire must consider whether the company are going to make a tunnel under the piece of land they require, or an open cutting, or an embankment, whether they are going to cut the road in two, or whether they are going merely to build a viaduct over it. If he is entitled to look into such matters as these in order to find out how the severance is to take place, why should he not take into account, in considering the question of material detriment, the fact that the archway which is to be built will be of a certain size, and that a right of passage underneath it will be given to the landowner? It seems to me that that is the only rational way of interpreting the section. It is clear that s. 42 was passed for the benefit of the company. To hold that the mere fact of severance is evidence of material detriment would, in my opinion, destroy the efficacy of the section. Therefore, I think that the question left by the umpire must be answered in the affirmative. In his award the umpire has come to the conclusion that, if the company are entitled in law to do what they have done and have undertaken to do, then the severance will cause no material detriment to the remainder of the property, and consequently the owner cannot compel the company to purchase the whole of it.

With regard to Mulliner v. Midland Rail. Co. (1), I do not think that it has any application to the present case. If it is to be cited as a case which decides that a railway company has no power to give a right of way under a railway embankment from one side to the other, I should disagree with it. But it seems to be obvious that if a railway company make an embankment across a large field, for instance, they have power to agree to make an arch under the railway to give access from one part of the field to the other. I, therefore, do not think that the effect of the decision in Mulliner v. Midland Rail. Co. (1) is quite that which is suggested. Two of the other cases cited, namely, Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Petty (2) and Foster v. London, Chatham and Dover Rail. Co. (3) were founded upon a proposition laid down by PARKE, J., in R. v. Inhabitants of Leake (4). That was a case of the dedication as a public highway of the surface of land vested in trustees for certain public purposes, and PARKE, J., used these words (5 B. & Ad. at p. 478):

"If the land were vested by the Act of Parliament in commissioners, so that they were thereby bound to use it for some special purpose, incompatible with its public use as a highway, I should have thought that such trustees would have been incapable in point of law, to make dedication of it; but if such use by the public be not incompatible with the objects prescribed by the Act, then I think it clear that the commissioners have that power."

I do not think that it would necessarily be incompatible with the objects of a railway company that they should give access underneath their railway from land on one side of the line to land on the other. But, as has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, the company in this case would be liable under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to make accommodation works to give access to the remainder of the plaintiff's land. I think that this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I quite agree that we ought to answer in the affirmative the question that the umpire has left to the court. The matters mentioned in paras. 5, 6, and 7 of the Special Case may be shortly stated as follows. The railway company contended that in the event of their taking the portion of land for which they gave notice to treat, they would be bound under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to make and maintain accommodation works for providing access for the owner to the remainder of his land. They further contended that an access by means of a roadway under the arch of the viaduct that is being built would be such an accommodation work as is provided for in s. 68. That is the effect of para. 5. Then para. 6 gives the contention of the landowner, and para. 7 tells us what the umpire did. In considering this case I do not at all rely upon the alternative undertaking that was given by the company. I treat their liability under s. 68, as the substantial and important one, namely, that they were bound by that section to make and maintain a sufficient and convenient access to the portion of the factory which they did not require to purchase. It appears that the company have actually entered into possession of the piece of land comprised in their notice to treat, and have actually constructed a great part of the viaduct which is to be built across it, including the archway under which they proposed to give access to the remainder of the land. Not only does this archway give physical and visible access to the land, but it is clear that the access is just such an access as under s. 68 the company would be bound to give. It is not a question merely of their being willing to do this or that; they have actually done something which they would have been bound by Act of Parliament to do. Looking at the dimensions of the roadway and considering its maximum gradient, I do not feel the slightest doubt that if the question had been brought before justices under s. 69, they would have held that this access is an accommodation work sufficient for the accommodation of the landowner. If that is so, I think that it is such a thing as the company would be bound to give and the landowner be bound to accept as a sufficient access to the remainder of the land. The railway company would under these circumstances be bound to grant that access in perpetuity. I think, therefore, that it was the duty of the umpire to take these facts into account in forming the opinion which he arrived at, namely, that, supposing the access were legally secured in perpetuity to the landowner, there would be no material detriment to the remainder of the property by reason of the severance of the piece of land included in the notice to treat.

With reference to the cases that have been cited, I think it is unnecessary to add anything with regard to Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Petty (2) and Foster v. London, Chatham and Dover Rail. Co. (3). Those cases speak for themselves. Mulliner v. Midland Rail. Co. (1) seems to me to have no sort of reference to a case like the present. In that case the land was purchased out and out by the railway company for the purposes of the railway, and a railway station built on it. It was vested in the railway company for the purposes of the railway and for no other purpose. I conceive that the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was in accordance with the law, and I do not know that it has ever been seriously disputed. No doubt attempts have been made, as in the present case, to extend that decision further than was intended by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, and such attempts have failed. His decision was that a piece of land taken by the railway company for the purposes of their railway, and required for those purposes cannot be alienated by the company without the authority of an Act of Parliament. That is undoubted law. But then the Master of the Rolls went a little further, and held that not only was the company unable in law to alienate the land, but that it was also unable to create a perpetual right of way over it. That seems to me to be a reasonable deduction from the proposition that the land could not be alienated. That was all that was intended to be decided in Mulliner v. Midland Rail. Co. (1), and that case has no application to that which is now before us. I quite agree that this appeal must be allowed.

Re DAINTRY. Ex parte MANT AND MANT

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Wright and Bigham, JJ.), March 28, August 10, 1899]

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Sir Francis Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.), November 10, 1899]

By s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [re-enacted by s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]: "Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made under this Act, and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under such receiving order, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively . . ."

Before Dec. 24, 1892, the bankrupt owed £86 to M. On that date he committed an act of bankruptcy. On Dec. 31, 1892, the parties entered into a contract by which the bankrupt sold his business to M. in consideration of the payment to him by M. of a share of the profits in respect of business transacted for persons for whom the bankrupt had until then been acting, "such sum to be payable for three years only and to be ascertained annually on Jan. 1 in each year." M. began to carry on the business. On Jan. 17 a receiving order was made against the bankrupt. The bankrupt was adjudicated bankrupt in August, 1893. No profits had been made in the business by M. before the date of the receiving order, but after that date and before and after the date of adjudication profits were made which amounted to £300 by the end of the three years specified in the agreement. M. had not proved in the bankruptcy for the bankrupt's debt to him of £86, but when the trustee in the bankruptcy claimed the £300 as part of the bankrupt's estate M. deducted the £86 and paid the balance to the trustee.

Held: (i) the date with reference to which the account under s. 38 was to be taken was the date of the receiving order; (ii) although at that date there was no ascertained existing liability to the bankrupt on the part of M., nor any sum due, certain or uncertain, under the contract of Dec. 31, 1892, but merely a possibility of liability contingent on things being done which M. had not by contract bound himself to do, M. was entitled to set off the debt of £86 against the £300.

Appeal by Messrs Mant and Mant, solicitors, of Petworth, Sussex, from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (WRIGHT and BIGHAM, JJ.), on an appeal from a decision of the judge of the Brighton County Court directing them to pay to the trustee in bankruptcy of C. J. Daintrey, a solicitor, also of Petworth, a sum in respect of a share of the profits of business transacted by them and due to the debtor under an agreement between them and the debtor, dated Dec. 31, 1892.

Before Dec. 24, 1892, Daintrey owed Mant and Mant £86, money paid by them at his request. On Dec. 24, 1892, Daintrey committed an act of bankruptcy, of which, however, Mant and Mant had no notice. On Dec. 31, 1892, Daintrey sold his practice to Mant and Mant. The agreement for the sale was in writing, and it was described as "Heads of agreement as to the acquisition by Mant and Mant of the practice hitherto carried on by Daintrey at Petworth." The price to be paid by Mant and Mant for the purchase of the business was to be

"a sum equivalent to the usual agency share of profits in respect of business transacted for persons for whom Daintrey is now acting . . . such sum to be payable for three years only, and to be ascertained annually on Jan. 1 in each year."

Mant and Mant took possession of the practice and commenced to carry on the business. On Jan. 17, 1893, a receiving order was made against Daintrey, and then for the first time Mant and Mant discovered that he had committed an act of bankruptcy. Daintrey was adjudicated bankrupt in August, 1893. No profits had been made in the business by Mant and Mant before the date of the receiving order, but since that date profits had been made both before and after the date of adjudication, and at the end of three years the sum of £300 was due and payable by Mant and Mant under the agreement. In other words, the price to be paid for the purchase of the business was then ascertained at the sum of £300. Mant and Mant had not proved for their claim of £86 in Daintrey's bankruptcy, but the trustee having called on them to pay the £300, as part of the bankrupt's estate, they deducted the £86 due from Daintrey to them and paid the balance. The trustee objected to this deduction, alleging that the £300 ought to be paid in full, and that Mant and Mant were only entitled to take a dividend on the claim for £86.

The case was heard by the Divisional Court on Mar. 28, 1899, when judgment was reserved. Judgment was delivered on Aug. 10, 1899, when the following judgments were read.

WRIGHT, J.—Judgment in this case has been long delayed from various causes, but mainly because of the difficulty and great importance in bankruptcy of some of the questions which have to be determined. The learned and experienced judge below has not been able to give us any assistance beyond the statement that he is much puzzled, and we ourselves have not succeeded in agreeing upon a conclusion on some of the points in the case.

The question is whether there ought to be a set-off pro tanto of a debt due from the bankrupt before his bankruptcy against a debt due to the bankrupt's estate which did not come into existence as a debt, demand, or liability until after the date of the receiving order, but was until after that date a mere possibility of indebtedness. In considering this question, there are three things which it is specially important to observe. The first is that there is nothing to show any connection between the cross-demands. They are in respect of entirely separate and independent transactions. The second is that Mant and Mant were not under any obligation to carry on the business which they had bought. They might not choose to do any business, or none might be offered to them, or there might not be any profit. The third is that the question arises, not in an action, but in a proceeding in the bankruptcy. The question, of course, does not depend on the general law of set-off, which until 1879 depended on the statutes 2 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 13, and 8 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 4, and since the repeal of those Acts by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879, and the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883 [repealed], depends on the saving clauses of the repealing Acts. There cannot in the present case be a set-off by virtue merely of that law for two reasons. One is that it applies only to set-off in an action. The other is that the general law of set-off has always been held to be applicable only where the cross-demands are in the same right, or in cases within the special exception as to executors which was contained in the repealed Acts.

In the present case, in the events which happened, the contract of Dec. 31, 1892, became, by force of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, transferred to and vested in the trustees retrospectively as from the date of the act of bankruptcy. At that date there was no existing liability on the part of Mant and Mant to pay anything or to restore anything. There never was any right of action in the bankrupt on the contract, or against the trustee for the debt. The cross-demands, therefore, are not mutual, and are not in the same right: see, for example, per LORD ELDON in Ex parte Blagden (1), Shipman v. Thompson (2), Wood v. Smith (3) (4 M. & W. at p. 525, per PARKE, B.), Groom v. Mealey (4) (see 4 M. & W. 526, n.), and Beckwith v. Bullen (5). There are cases, such as Hulme v. Muggleston (6) and Bittleston v. Timmis (7), in which this difficulty has been overcome by the adoption in actions of the doctrines of bankruptcy law, but such cases depend on that law and not on the statutes of set-off. The present case, therefore, must be determined solely upon the proper construction of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 38 [re-enacted in s. 31 of Bankruptcy Act, 1914: 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321].

On this section it must first be observed that, although by its terms the enactment seems to be confined to set-off as between the bankrupt and a person proving or claiming to prove in the bankruptcy, yet it is settled that the same right of set-off may be claimed in an action brought or in other proceedings taken in the bankruptcy by a trustee or liquidator: Peat v. Jones & Co. (8) and Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. (9). There is no difference for this purpose between the language of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and that of the Act of 1883. It is, therefore, no ground of objection to Mant and Mant's claim of set-off that they are asserting it, not by way of proof, but in answer to the trustee's application for an order for payment of the £300.

The first question to be determined is: What is the date with reference to which the account is to be taken under the section and the set-off made? Until this question is answered it is impossible to say what claims on either side are to be taken into account. Is the date to be the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy as defined by s. 43, or the date of the receiving order, or the date of adjudication, or the date when the particular creditor comes in to prove, or the date when an action is brought or other proceeding taken by the trustee against him? It is obvious that the question whether and how far the set-off is to be allowed may have to be answered differently according as one or other of these dates is to be adopted. In the present case, if the date is the date of adjudication, Mant and Mant can utilise their own claim to defeat a part of the claim against them under the agreement, but it may be otherwise if the date is the date of the receiving order.

Under the earlier statutes, such as 4 & 5 Anne, c. 4, and 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 28, it was settled in Ex parte Groome (10), by LORD HARDWICKE, that the line was to be drawn at the date of the commission, which was then the commencement of the bankruptcy, although the assignees' title might, and usually of course did, relate back to an earlier time; and Dickson v. Evans (11) (6 Term Rep. at p. 58, per LORD KENYON, C.J.) was to the same effect. The Bankruptcy Act, 1825, s. 50, A confined the set-off of mutual credits to such as had arisen before the commission (Collins v. Jones (12)), and that enactment continued in force until 1849. The Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, abolished fiats and substituted petitions followed by adjudications. There was no enactment like that in s. 11 of the Act of 1869 or in s. 43 of the Act of 1883, making the bankruptcy relate back to and B commence at the act of bankruptcy on which the petition was founded, or any prior act of bankruptcy, the common-law doctrines of relation of title being apparently thought sufficient. The set-off section (s. 171) contained no indication of the date with reference to which the account was to be taken. On the Act of 1849 Naoroji v. Chartered Bank of India (13), where the headnote (L.R. 3 C.P. 444) is wrong as to the facts—the best report is in 18 L.T. 358—and Astley v. Gurney (14) were decided. In the former case BOVILL, C.J., said (L.R. 3 C.P. at C p. 449):

“The turning point is what was the state of things at the time of the bankruptcy, or that which is for this purpose equivalent thereto, at the execution of the deed?”

BYLES and MONTAGUE SMITH, JJ., agreed, and from their judgments it is plain D that they meant that in case of bankruptcy the line was to be drawn at the date of adjudication. In the latter case the “time of the bankruptcy” is said to be the material date, and evidently that is intended to mean the date of adjudication. So, in Re Douglas, Ex parte Ryder (15), JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ., decided that under a deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which provided for distribution E as if there had been an adjudication at the date of the deed, the line must be drawn at that date.

The Act of 1869, like the Act of 1849, did not explicitly define the date with reference to which the account was to be taken. By s. 11 it enacted in general terms that the bankruptcy should be deemed to have relation back to, and to F commence at, the completion of the act of bankruptcy on which the adjudication was made, or the first act of bankruptcy committed within twelve months before adjudication. By s. 15 it vested in the trustee all the property which belonged to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, but by s. 31 the debts, etc., provable in the bankruptcy were debts, etc., to which the bankrupt was G subject at the date of the order of adjudication, or might during the bankruptcy become subject by reason of any obligation incurred before that date. By s. 39 it provided for set-off as follows:

“Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between the bankrupt and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under his bankruptcy, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set-off against any sum due from the other H party, and the balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively. . . .”

In 1874 this section was considered by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ., in Re Deveze, Ex parte Barnett (16), where the bankrupt owed a creditor £3,010 and the creditor owed the bankrupt £88, secured by a lien on I goods of the creditor. The question was whether the trustee was entitled to get paid the £88 in full by enforcing his lien, and it was held that the debts were pro tanto reciprocally cancelled by the bankruptcy, and the lien ceased with the cancellation of the debt for which it was a security. There the creditor had come in to prove for his £3,010, and LORD SELBORNE, L.C., seems to have considered that the set-off took effect at the time of his so coming in. He said (9 Ch. App. at p. 295):

“when there have been mutual credits . . . and a proof is to be made in bankruptcy, there is to be a rule of set-off, not, as I understand it, at the

A option of either party, but an absolute statutory rule—"the balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively."
 . . . Barnett & Co. come in to prove, and the statute expressly says that the amount of their proof shall be ascertained by writing off the small debt from the larger. . . ."

B MELLISH, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 297) :

C "The simple question is whether, upon the construction of this clause, the set-off is not made equivalent to payment. I doubt whether it does not affect it even before either party has come in to prove; but, at any rate, when the party does come in to prove, the statute sets the one debt against the other, and that is equivalent to payment. It, in fact, is equivalent to saying, where there are mutual debts, that a party, by coming in and claiming to prove, necessarily causes a payment or satisfaction of his debt so far as the set-off extends. . . ."

D In 1881 the question was expressly raised in the Privy Council in Elliott v. Turquand (17) whether the account for the purposes of set-off under s. 39 of the Act of 1869 must not stop and be taken as at the date of the act of bankruptcy. It was held that in a case of continuous mutual dealings and accounts the line is not ipso facto drawn as at the act of bankruptcy, but the account must be continued at least until the party claiming the benefit of s. 39 has notice of an act of bankruptcy.

E In 1884, in Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co., the question was whether the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, had imported into liquidations the bankruptcy rule of set-off. In holding that it had that effect, LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said of s. 39 (9 App. Cas. at p. 438) :

F "Your Lordships observe that it is not that it may be—it is not a thing which is optional, but it is a positive, absolute rule for the purpose of proof in bankruptcy, and nothing can be proved according to that rule in such cases except the balance of the account; that only is regarded as the claim which it is competent for the creditor to make when he comes in to prove under the bankruptcy."

G The terms of this observation seem expressly to limit the set-off to cases of proof, but this cannot be the real meaning, because the decision of the House was in affirmance of the judgment of the Court of Appeal allowing a set-off, not upon a proof in the liquidation, but in an action by the liquidator.

In the same year, in Re Milan Tramways Co., Ex parte Theys (18), in the Court of Appeal, LORD SELBORNE said (25 Ch.D. at p. 591)—and this was the ground of decision of the case :

H "Under s. 39 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the line is drawn at the time of the bankruptcy, and the rights of the parties are not to be altered by subsequent transactions. A person comes in to prove a debt against the bankrupt's estate; if there are mutual credits between the bankrupt and the creditor, then an account is to be taken, and the balance is to be proved against the estate, or paid to the estate, as the case may be."

I FRY, L.J., said of s. 39 (ibid. at p. 594) :

"That section refers to the state of things at the time of the bankruptcy. . . . That has been the uniform rule."

These cases seem to be decisive that under the Act of 1869 the account was to be taken with reference to the time of the bankruptcy, but they do not explicitly determine whether that expression meant the date of adjudication or the date of the act of bankruptcy to which the bankruptcy related and at which it commenced by virtue of s. 11 of that Act; and Elliott v. Turquand (17) remains the only express authority on that point.

The Act of 1883 differs from the Act of 1869 in the fundamental particular of the introduction of receiving orders preliminary to adjudication. It differs also in this, that whereas in the Act of 1869 the provision that a bankruptcy shall be deemed to have relation back to and to commence at the date of the act of bankruptcy (or some earlier act of bankruptcy) was contained in a section (s. 11) which was placed among the general provisions at the beginning of the Act so as apparently to govern the whole Act, the corresponding provision (s. 43) of the Act of 1883 is placed in a fasciculus of clauses under the heading of "Property available for Payment of Debts" [as is now s. 37 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]. Further, the language of s. 38 of this Act [Act of 1914, s. 31] differs from the language of s. 39 of the Act of 1869.

It is necessary briefly to consider the general framework of the Act of 1883 in order to determine what is the effect of these alterations. By s. 5, on proof of an available act of bankruptcy the court may upon petition make a receiving order "for the protection of the estate" [Act of 1914, s. 3]. By s. 9 [Act of 1914, s. 7] on the making of a receiving order an official receiver

"shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy"

without leave; but this section has not the effect of divesting the property of the debtor. If no arrangement is approved by the creditors, adjudication follows, and thereupon (s. 20) the property of the debtor vests in the trustee (or official receiver) for division among the creditors [Act of 1914, s. 18]. By s. 37 the debts provable in the bankruptcy are the debts

"to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order" [Act of 1914, s. 30 (3)].

Then follows s. 38 [Act of 1914, s. 31], providing for set-off in case of "mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made under this Act and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under such receiving order."

In s. 39 of the Act of 1869 the words were :

"Between the bankrupt and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under his bankruptcy."

Except as above mentioned, this section is in all material respects verbatim the same as s. 39 of the Act of 1869. By s. 43 (under the heading "Property available for Payment of Debts") [Act of 1914, s. 37] :

"The bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him"

—or the earliest act of bankruptcy within the preceding three months. (Under the Act of 1869 it was twelve months.) By s. 44 [Act of 1914, s. 38] the property divisible among the creditors is the debtor's property at the commencement of the bankruptcy or acquired before his discharge. By s. 45 [Act of 1914, s. 40] executions pending at the time of the bankruptcy are not protected unless completed before the receiving order and before notice of act of bankruptcy or of petition. By s. 49 [Act of 1914, s. 45] bona fide transactions before the receiving order are protected—not, as in the Act of 1869, before adjudication. By s. 168 [Act of 1914, s. 167] "property" includes contingent interests arising out of or incident to property.

If these provisions [of the Act of 1883] are considered without reference to authority, it seems to me that they ought to be understood as fixing the date with reference to which the account is to be taken for the purposes of set-off at the date of the receiving order, which for nearly all the purposes of the Act, except the commencement of the title of the trustee, is made the material date. Prima facie it would seem that the line which is drawn for defining what debts are to be provable in the bankruptcy must be also the line for defining what cross-claims are to be set-off in the case of a creditor whose set-off is not stopped at an earlier date by notice of an act of bankruptcy. If the line were to be drawn at different times for the two purposes of proof and set-off, the result might be unjust. If it were drawn for the purposes of set-off at the "commencement of the bankruptcy," as defined by s. 43, there would be three months (under the Act of 1869, s. 11, it would have been twelve months) during which one side of a cross-account would be growing for purposes of proof, and yet the other side would be cut short for purposes of set-off. If it were not drawn until adjudication, the injustice would be the other way, but it might be equally great.

I cannot find any case on the construction of the Act of 1883 which is opposed to this view, nor any in which it is expressly adopted. In 1885, in Re Gillespie, Ex parte Reid (19) the only point decided by CAVE, J., was that a creditor of the bankrupt, if he accepts after notice of the bankruptcy a bill belonging to the bankrupt's estate, cannot claim to set-off his own demand against his new liability on the bill, and, although the decisions upon the Act of 1869 are cited and relied on, it does not seem that the question whether the line should be drawn at the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy, as defined by s. 43, or at the date of the receiving order, or at the date of adjudication, was considered at all. It, however, rather appears that the receiving order was regarded as "the bankruptcy." In Palmer v. Day & Sons (20) it was assumed, apparently without discussion, that the date of the receiving order was for the purposes of that case the material date. In Elgood v. Harris (21) the "date of the bankruptcy" is treated as the critical date, but there is nothing to indicate what this means. There seems to be no other reported case upon the Act of 1883 in which any reference is made to the question as arising in bankruptcy. In liquidation the date is in several cases—for example, Eberle's Hotels and Restaurant Co., Ltd. v. Jonas (22) (18 Q.B.D. at p. 463, per FRY, L.J.)—assumed to be the date of the winding-up; and no doubt, as CHARLES, J., thought in Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd (23), the date of the petition for winding-up is, by virtue of s. 84 of the Companies Act, 1862 [see now the Companies Act, 1948, s. 229], the critical date in liquidation.

On the whole, it appears to me that, whereas under the earlier Bankruptcy Acts the date with reference to which the account was to be taken for purposes of set-off was the date of the commission, and under the Act of 1869 it was the date of adjudication, under the Act of 1883 it is the date of the receiving order, which is substituted for adjudication as the epoch down to, but not beyond, which debts are provable. On this point my learned brother agrees.

The next question is whether in the present case on Jan. 17, 1893, the date of the receiving order, there were mutual demands or sums due which were then capable of being made the subjects of an account for the purposes of set-off under s. 38. It is, of course, immaterial whether the amount of the demand on either side was then ascertained or not. If there was then an existing liability such as is capable of being brought into an account, it is in general immaterial whether its amount could have been then ascertained, provided it can be ascertained when the account is taken. A liability to do or pay something in futuro will suffice, although the time for doing or paying it has not arrived. In the present case there was at that date no existing liability at all, but merely a contract under which there was a possibility of liability contingent upon things being done which Mant and Mant had not by the contract bound themselves to do, and contingent upon those things, if done, resulting in a profit. Such a contingent liability, if it had attached to the bankrupt, might have been matter of set-off, because by the express provisions of s. 37 it is made the subject of estimation, and the estimated sum would have been a debt provable against the bankrupt, unless declared by the court incapable of estimation. But there is no corresponding enactment compelling or enabling a valuation to be made of a merely possible or contingent liability of another person to the bankrupt, and in the absence of any such enactment the difficulty is to see how an account of "sums due" taken with reference to a particular date can include anything in respect of such a merely possible liability.

From the earliest times there have been numerous, and sometimes conflicting, decisions as to the commensurability of cross-demands of various kinds, but in nearly all, if not all, of them there has been an actual existing liability on each side, absolute or defeasible, and the question has usually been whether the cross-liabilities are commensurable, so as to be capable of being made the subjects of an account. It is not necessary to consider in detail the numerous decisions of this kind which are collected in the notes to Rose v. Hart (24) (2 Smith, L.C. (10th Edn.), p. 288) and Smith v. Hodson (25) (2 Smith, L.C. (10th Edn.), p. 143), but there are some cases to which reference may be made, though in considering them the successive variations and enlargements of the enactments as to set-off in the Acts of 1825 and 1869 must be borne in mind, as well as the fact that until the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 [repealed], s. 153, unliquidated damages even for breach of contract were not in general provable in the bankruptcy. It must also be borne in mind with reference to cases relating to insurance that the earlier Acts contained a special provision enabling proof to be made on policies of insurance which had not matured. In Ex parte Prescott (26) the bankrupt owed money to a creditor, who was liable to the bankrupt on a bond conditioned for the payment of money at a date subsequent to the commission. The creditor applied for leave to set-off, instead of proving for his own claim. LORD HARDWICKE said it was a new case, to be determined on principles of equity, and he held it a mutual credit because of the immediate obligation of the bond.

In each of the series of cases which terminated with Rose v. Hart (24) there was on the one side at the time of the bankruptcy a money debt, and on the other side an existing liability on the part of the creditor to account for goods held by him as a bailee, and the only contest was whether the bailment was such as implied a pecuniary liability, the amount of which could be ascertained by calculation: see per TINDAL, C.J., in Gibson v. Bell (27), where an important mistake in Rose v. Hart (24) is pointed out. In Smith v. Hodson (25) and several other cases the liabilities of accommodation acceptors, though unripe at the bankruptcy, and though defeasible in case the holder had recovered from the drawer, or the claim of an indorsee of a bill which at the time of the bankruptcy was under discount with his bankers, and, therefore, not at that time held by him, had before the Bankruptcy Act, 1825, been held matters of set-off; and in Collins v. Jones (12), which has been approved in the House of Lords—McKinnon v. Armstrong Bros. & Co. (28)—it was settled that under the Bankruptcy Act, 1825, s. 50, a person who before bankruptcy of the acceptor of a bill or maker of a note had a title to the bill or note and is the holder of it at the time when the account for the purpose of set-off is taken does not lose his right of set-off merely because the bill or note was not in his possession at the time of the bankruptcy. In Young v. Bank of Bengal (29) the creditor held securities belonging to the bankrupt which were to be applied only for a particular purpose and upon a particular contingency, and for that reason the creditors' liability to account for them was held not matter of set-off, although that liability existed at the time of the bankruptcy. In Naoroji v. Chartered Bank of India (13) the creditor held bills for collection for the bankrupt, and his liability to account for the proceeds was held to be matter for set-off, although the authority to collect was revocable, and the pecuniary liability, therefore, defeasible. In Astley v. Gurney (14) the creditor held bills of lading to be returned to the bankrupt, but before bankruptcy the bankrupt authorised the sale of the goods; and it was held that the liability to return the bills which existed before authority given to sell was not commensurable with the creditor's money

A debt to the bankrupt, and could not have been set-off, but that on an irrevocable authority being given to sell there was a commensurable pecuniary liability.

Under the wider language of the Act of 1869, MALINS, V.-C., in Booth v. Hutchinson (30), decided that in an action for rent brought by a bankrupt's trustee the defendant could set-off unliquidated damages for breach of an agreement to finish a house, although the amount could not be ascertained until after the bankruptcy. In 1875 Re Linkester, Ex parte Price (31) came before JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ. This, perhaps, is the nearest of all the reported cases to the present one. There an insurance company insured a life, lent money to the assured on his policy, and went into liquidation. The assured became bankrupt. On the liquidator proving in the bankruptcy for the loan, the assured's trustee sought to set-off the value of the policy as valued in the liquidation. It was held that there was no set-off in the bankruptcy, on the ground that there was nothing due on the policy, and the valuation of it in the liquidation did not make the amount of that valuation a sum due. At 33 L.T. 114 MELLISH, L.J., is reported as saying:

"There must be made out that the value of the policy is a sum 'due' which can be set-off against some claims on the other side, and under the mutual credit clause."

In that case there was at the time of the bankruptcy a certain existing liability to make a payment at an uncertain future time, and it was held not the subject of a set-off because there was no sum due which could be ascertained or made the subject of an account or set-off. In the present case there is even a greater difficulty of the same kind, and the further one, that at the date of Daintrey's bankruptcy there was no existing or certain future liability at all.

In Peat v. Jones & Co. (8) the Court of Appeal (SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.) approved the decision of MALINS, V.-C., in Booth v. Hutchinson (30), and held that there might be a set-off of a claim for unliquidated damages for breach of a contract made before the bankruptcy. This was followed in Jack v. Kipping (32) in relation to a claim for unliquidated damages for fraudulent representation inducing a contract of sale; and, in Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. (9) in relation to unliquidated damages for non-delivery of goods. In Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., Lee and Chapman's Case (33), at the time of the liquidation the company was under contract to keep streets in repair at fixed prices if so required, and the other party was liable for the contract price of laying the streets, and it was held that the cross-claims were the subjects of set-off, although there had been no breach before bankruptcy of the company's obligation. In Eberle's Hotels and Restaurant Co., Ltd. v. Jonas (22) it was held that there could be no set-off between the liquidating company's liability to pay money and the other party's liability to account for cigars deposited as security for a specific debt, LORD ESHER observing (18 Q.B.D. at p. 467) that "an account cannot be taken and a balance struck in respect of a debt on one side and a liability to restore goods on the other."

Such claims are incommensurable.

In Re Pollitt, Ex parte Minor (34) and Re Mid-Kent Fruit Factory Ltd. (35) it was held that a money debt due from the bankrupt could not be set-off against an advance of money made by the bankrupt for a specific purpose. In Palmer v. Day & Sons (20), which was much relied on by counsel for Mant and Mant, the only point was the old one, whether the bankrupt's liability for money was commensurable with the other party's liability as a bailee of pictures for sale, and Naoroji v. Chartered Bank of India (13) was followed. In Elgood v. Harris (21) an underwriter's trustee in bankruptcy sued to recover salvage moneys received by the defendant after the bankruptcy which belonged to the bankrupt's estate. The defendant sought to set-off the bankrupt's liabilities to him on other policies. It was held by HENN COLLINS, J., that there was no set-off. The salvage was not due at the time of the bankruptcy, but accrued afterwards by operation of law:

and it did not result from any credit given by the bankrupt before bankruptcy. A The defendant at the time of the bankruptcy had nothing of the bankrupt's in his hands, nor was he then under any contract or liability of which the salvage could be considered to be the proceeds.

I have cited all the modern cases except one which seem to have any bearing on the question, and there seems to be nothing in any of them which supports the claim of set-off in a case like the present one. The only case which to my mind B causes any difficulty is Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd (23). There the company had, in 1879, issued to Dodd so-called "endowment" policies which bound them to pay £2,000 in May, 1888, to him or his executors, the only condition being that the premiums should be paid. Early in 1887 he borrowed money from the company upon mortgage of the "policies." Afterwards the company was C wound-up on petition. The "policies" matured after petition, but before the order to wind-up, all premiums having been duly paid, some of them after petition. The liquidators brought an action for the money lent, and Dodd pleaded a set-off of the £2,000 which had become payable to him before action. It was objected that inasmuch as the winding-up order related back to the petition, there was not at the commencement of the liquidation any liability on the policies, but only a liability D contingent on future payment of premiums. CHARLES, J., allowed the set-off, saying ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 411):

"There was no new transaction. The loans on the one hand and the insurance on the other were both prior in date to the winding-up petition, and there was, when the petition was presented, a debt due from the defendant, and a contract with him which would probably result—and has in fact resulted—in E a debt due to him . . . there was also a subsisting contract with the company that they would on a day certain, which arrived before the winding-up order, pay the defendant his policy moneys less the amount of his loan. The only element of uncertainty was the possibility that the defendant would not pay his premiums. This element was removed by his duly paying them, and therefore the sum due to him became capable of proof in the liquidation." F

The judgment of CHARLES, J., was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The court laid stress on the fact that the question arose in an action and not in a proceeding in the liquidation, and they refused to consider how the matter would have stood in a proceeding in bankruptcy, or to question the decision in Re Lankester (31).

It is plain, therefore, that there is nothing in that case which as a decision G governs the present question in the bankruptcy. Nor on the facts of that case is there any real similarity to this case. The so-called "policies" were not insurances at all, nor upon any contingency. There at the date of the petition there was, so far as the company was concerned, an absolute liability to pay the £2,000 in the sense that they could not prevent it from becoming payable. If Dodd chose to pay the one or two remaining premiums the liability must become complete. H It cannot be said that there was no existing obligation on the company. Nor was any matter of estimation involved. At the date of the petition the amount which the company would have to pay was ascertained, and the amount or value of the unpaid premiums was a simple matter of calculation. In the present case there was no existing obligation on Mant and Mant at the date of the receiving order.
They were not to come under any obligation unless they chose to do the business I and could get the business. In my judgment, in Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v.
Dodd (23) the set-off would have been allowable in bankruptcy as well as in an action. So it might have been in this case if Mant and Mant had by the agreement bound themselves to do business.

On the whole, therefore, the considerations governing the present case appear to me to be as follows. The proceeding being in bankruptcy, the question is whether there was matter of set-off at the time with reference to which the account is to be taken under s. 38—that is, the date of the receiving order. At that date there was no sum due, certain or uncertain, nor any existing liability, and without new and entirely uncertain events and the voluntary action of Mant and Mant, nothing would become due. Mant and Mant could not be compelled at the time of the receiving order to admit any kind of liability as then existing, nor could they have forced the bankrupt or the trustee to accept any valuation of composition. Suppose that, on the one hand, the agreement had been unlimited in time, and, on the other hand, the bankrupt's debt to Mant and Mant had been so large as to exceed any probable liability of Mant and Mant under the agreement during Mant and Mant's life or continuance in business, and Mant and Mant had proved in the bankruptcy for their whole claim, how could it have been ascertained what sum the trustee could set-off? Neither the trustee nor the creditor has any such power given to him to accelerate or value the future and merely possible liability of the creditor as is given in the like case as against the bankrupt. A contract to build a ship or supply coals or make a street at a time which has not arrived when bankruptcy occurs is an existing liability the amount of which is then capable of being ascertained with more or less accuracy. But a possibility of liability cannot be valued unless by express enactment, and the statute makes no provision for this in such a case.

The decision of LEACH, V.-C., in Whitaker v. Hall (36) seems to adopt this view. There the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy was indebted to a Mrs. Whitaker, and had a prospective claim against her for £2,000 payable at her death. She died after the bankruptcy, and the £2,000 was claimed from her representatives. It was held that they could not set-off under bankruptcy law the amount of their own claim because the prospective liability,

"being payable at the uncertain period of her death, was not the subject of computation so as to ascertain the balance within the words of the statute (Bankruptcy Act, 1781 (5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 28)). It is true that a value might have been set upon the sum payable upon the contingency of Mrs. Whitaker's death; so a value might be set upon every sum payable upon a contingency by the bankrupt, for the purpose of proof against his estate; but it is enough to say that the law has not provided for such a valuation."

The law has now provided for such a valuation in the one case but not in the other.

It is proper to observe that these conclusions are not necessarily applicable to a case in which the cross-demands arise out of one contract or transaction, or are in any manner interdependent. In such a case regard must be had to a new and different consideration. It may well be that the party who comes after the date for the account in bankruptcy to insist on the performance of one of two interdependent obligations must submit on his part to have set-off against his claim any cross-claim which has then ripened into an actual liability on the other side of the account. Suppose, for instance, a policy on a sailing ship for a distant voyage or a long period of time. The assured becomes bankrupt, owing premiums to the underwriter. Long afterwards a loss occurs, and the assured's trustee applies in bankruptcy for payment of the insurance money to the credit of the estate. It would be hard if the underwriter is not to have credit for the premiums owing to him. In such a case, and in many others which might be put, the account might be carried down to a date later than that which is prima facie the proper one. A principle of this kind seems to be indicated by the judgment in Jilliot v. Turquand (17); and Re Lancaster (31) is not inconsistent with it, for there no liability on the policy had ripened at the time when the question arose. In Beckwith v. Bullen (5) the court thought that in bankruptcy there might be a set-off as between premiums and immature liabilities on a policy. A remarkable decision of all the judges in Lord ELLENBOROUGH's time, in Graham v. Russell (37), points in the same direction. There a shipowner became bankrupt, owing for premiums. After the bankruptcy the ship was lost, and the shipowner sued the underwriter, who sought to set-off the premiums due; and it was held that he might do so because the Act 19 Geo. 2, c. 32 [Bankruptcy Act, 1745] had expressly enacted that a person insured before bankruptcy of the underwriter might prove for losses happening after the bankruptcy, and the court thought that as the epoch for taking the account was thus brought down for the one party, it ought to be brought down for the other also. But where, as in the present case, the cross-demands are separate and independent, I see no ground of equity or reason for altering the date which the statute indicates as the date with reference to which the account is to be taken for the purpose of set-off. In my opinion, the trustee's claim must be allowed with costs.

BIGHAM, J.—The question in this case is whether certain transactions between the appellants Messrs. Mant and Mant and the bankrupt Daintrey come within the mutual credit section (s. 38) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The county court judge held that they did not, and from that decision Mant and Mant appeal.

I am of opinion that Mant and Mant are entitled to deduct the £86 due to them by Daintrey from the £300 due by them under the agreement. The law regulating the adjustment of cross-claims between a bankrupt and his creditors is statute-law, and is to be found exclusively in s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The terms of this section seem to me to cover the case before the court. The dealings are mutual—that is to say, they are in the same right, and they are between a debtor against whom a receiving order has been made and a creditor claiming to prove a debt under the receiving order—that is to say, having a right to prove a debt in the bankruptcy proceedings initiated by the receiving order. It was argued for the trustee that the account directed to be taken by s. 38 must be taken as at the date of the receiving order, and it was said that, inasmuch as there was nothing payable by Mant and Mant at that date, no such account could possibly be taken, and that, therefore, the case did not fall within the section. The judgment of LORD SELBORNE in Re Milan Tramways Co., Ex parte Theys (18) was referred to as supporting the contention. That case has nothing to do with the point now under consideration; but in his judgment, LORD SELBORNE, referring to the mutual credit section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, said: [His LORDSHIP read the passage read by WRIGHT, J. (ante p. 663), and continued:] The answer to this argument is that Mant and Mant are not seeking to alter the rights of the parties by reference to subsequent transactions, but are seeking to ascertain them by reference to the natural outcome of previous transactions. LORD SELBORNE's observations, so far from supporting the trustee's contention, seem to me to show that the account which the section of the Act directed should be taken is to be taken when the claim on the one side or the other is presented.

In the case before the court there are no subsequent transactions; the debt, on the one hand, and the agreement out of which the cross-debt arises, on the other hand, both came into existence before the date of the receiving order, and the account must, in my opinion, be taken by placing the one debt against the other and ascertaining the difference. The judgment of CHARLES, J., in Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd (23), I think, supports the view put forward by Mant and Mant. The facts, so far as they are material for the purpose in hand, were as follows. Dodd had in 1879 effected two policies of insurance on his life with the plaintiff company; under the policies he became entitled to two payments of £1,000 each if he lived until May 7, 1888. He paid the premiums for many years, and then borrowed from the company a sum of £1,170 on the security of the two policies. In August, 1887, a petition was presented against the company, and it was ordered to be wound-up. In December, 1890, the liquidator sued Dodd for the £1,170, and the question was whether the defendant was entitled to set off so much of the two sums of £1,000 then due to him as would be sufficient to meet the claim for £1,170. CHARLES, J., held he was so entitled. It was argued for the liquidator that, inasmuch as the claims on the policies did not mature until after the commencement of the liquidation, there were no mutual dealings within s. 38 of the

A Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that, therefore, the set-off could not be pleaded. But CHARLES, J., dismissed the contention. It was enough, he said, that there existed at the commencement of the liquidation a debt on the one hand and a liability which in due course would mature into a debt on the other. He noticed the suggestion that a line should be drawn at the date of the commencement of liquidation (a date which corresponds with the date of the receiving order in a bankruptcy), and he pointed out that this is true to the extent of excluding the consequences of previous transactions. It may be said that Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd (23) is not the same as, but rather the converse of, the case now before us, because there Dodd was the debtor to the company before the liquidation and became the creditor afterwards, whereas in the present case Mant and Mant were the creditors before the bankruptcy and became the debtors afterwards. But this, in my opinion, makes no difference.

There was a case decided under s. 39 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869—Booth v. Hutchinson (30). In that case Booth was tenant of a house to Greetham at a time when Greetham became a bankrupt. At the commencement of the bankruptcy Greetham owed money to Booth. Booth continued as tenant after the commencement of the bankruptcy for some time, and so became liable to pay rent: he might have terminated his tenancy by notice if he had chosen to do so, but in fact he allowed the tenancy to continue. The trustee in the bankruptcy sought to recover the rent without allowing Booth to set-off the debt due by Greetham. It was held that the set-off should be allowed, and that in taking the account the debt due by the bankrupt on the one hand should be placed against any rent which might become due—"before the close of the bankruptcy, that is, before the distribution of the estate" on the other hand. The ground of the decision was that the rent arose out of a contract of tenancy entered into before the bankruptcy.

Palmer v. Day & Sons (20) was decided upon s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. In that case the bankrupt, Langton, owed a debt to Day & Sons, who were auctioneers. At the date of the receiving order Day & Sons held some pictures belonging to the bankrupt, which they had received from him with a revocable authority to sell them on his behalf. After the date of the receiving order the trustee gave instructions to Day & Sons to sell the pictures, which they accordingly did. They paid to the trustee the proceeds of the sale after deducting the amount of the debt due to them by Langton. The court held that they were entitled to deduct the amount of the debt due to them, upon the ground that the transactions were mutual dealings within the meaning of the Act.

Both in Booth v. Hutchinson (30) and in Palmer v. Day & Sons (20) there was a debt due by the bankrupt before the bankruptcy, and there was a debt which fell due to the bankrupt's estate after the commencement of the bankruptcy arising out of contracts entered into before the bankruptcy. In neither case could any account have been taken at the commencement of the bankruptcy, for it was quite uncertain whether anything, and, if anything, how much, might become due to the bankrupt's estate; yet the account was allowed to be taken when the demand against the creditor on the estate was put forward. The court in their judgment in Palmer v. Day & Sons (20) said there was a debt on the one side and a delivery of property with directions to turn it into money on the other. So in the present case there was a debt due by Daintrey on the one side and there was a transfer by him of his business on the terms that it should be worked so as to produce money payable to him on the other. Thus the cases seem to be identical. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

The judges differing, the appeal was dismissed and Mant and Mant with leave appealed.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—I cannot help thinking that there is an error in the judgment of WRIGHT, J., and that the view taken by BIGHAM, J., is correct. I agree with that part of the judgment of WRIGHT, J., in which, after reviewing the authorities, he came to the conclusion that the date of the receiving order and not the date of the bankruptcy was the time for ascertaining what mutual credits, debts, or other dealings were existing between the debtor and other persons. I cannot, however, agree with him in the second part of his judgment that there were no mutual debts, credits, or dealings between Daintrey and Mant and Mant. The facts were these. Daintrey owed Mant and Mant £86. On the other hand, Mant and Mant became liable under the document called "Heads of Agreement," dated Dec. 31, 1892, to pay Daintrey various sums under certain conditions, and what was payable by them was payable under the security of that document. Can we say that at the date of the receiving order there was nothing payable under that agreement? It is clear that when it was executed, money was, or would become, payable under it, and very considerable sums did in fact become payable.

Why the sum which would have become payable by Daintrey but for the bankruptcy should not be set-off against the debt which was due to him from Mant and Mant I cannot understand. How can the trustee claim to have 20s. in the pound from Mant and Mant and tell them that they must be content with a dividend on the debt due to them from Daintrey? Such a contention seems to me unarguable. It is to prevent such an injustice that the provisions of the old bankruptcy law have been recast and the mutual credit provisions have been inserted in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It appears to me to be true that when the trustee makes a claim against a person the bankruptcy proceedings to ascertain a claim do not apply. The machinery of the Act applies to a case of a claim against the estate. The trustee must wait till the assets fall in, and it is obvious that the operation of the mutual credit clause is not to be excluded altogether because there is no way of ascertaining the sum due at the particular date. WRIGHT, J., has, I think, gone wrong in the construction which he put upon this agreement. He thought that Mant and Mant were under no obligation towards Daintrey. It is true that they were not bound to do business for all the clients of Daintrey, and, above all, that no client of Daintrey's was bound to do business with them, but that Mant and Mant were bound on certain conditions to pay this money to Daintrey is clear. I think that the view of BIGHAM, J., was right and that this is a case in which s. 38 applies.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I agree.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with WRIGHT, J., that the date of the receiving order is the proper date to look at for the purpose of seeing whether there were mutual dealings between Mant and Mant and Daintrey, and whether those mutual dealings gave rise to any right of set-off. I think it is clear that there were such dealings at that time. There was due from Daintrey to Mant and Mant £86, and, on the other hand, Mant and Mant were under a liability to Daintrey by virtue of the agreement of Dec. 31, 1892. I agree that the amount for which they would ultimately become liable could not be ascertained until some time later than the date of the receiving order, and that the amount might be very small; but whatever sum did eventually become payable, became payable to Daintrey by virtue of the agreement of December, 1892, and no other. For Mant and Mant to obtain the advantage of the mutual credit clause it was not necessary that the amount payable under the contract should be immediately payable to the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, or that an account could be taken as between Mant and Mant and him at that date. It is quite sufficient if the account can be taken when the set-off arises. The trustee here is claiming money from Mant and Mant under an agreement between Daintrey and them entered into before, and existing at the date of the receiving order, and there have been no subsequent dealings between Mant and Mant, on the one hand, and Daintrey and his trustees, on the other, outside that agreement. That being so, I cannot see why, when the trustee claims that there is a sum of money due to him from Mant and Mant by virtue of that agreement, they should not set-off against that claim the sum due to them from the bankrupt's estate.

COOTE v. FORD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., and Rigby, L.J.), May 17, 1899]

Res Judicata—Payment into court—Acceptance by plaintiff—Right of parties to re-open dispute except matter in respect of which payment was made.

Payment into court by a defendant coupled with the plaintiff taking the money out is not equivalent to an admission by the defendant of the plaintiff's cause of action. The effect is merely that all proceedings in the action, so far as relates to the matter in respect of which the money was paid in, are at an end.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for trespass and an injunction to restrain them from trespassing on his land in the future. The defendants paid into court a sum in respect of the claim for damages, which was accepted by the plaintiff, and by their defence and counterclaim they set up a right by the custom of the manor entitling them to go on the plaintiff's land to kill and take rabbits.

Held: the payment into court by the defendants and its acceptance by the plaintiff did not estop the defendants from proceeding to maintain their claim of right or the plaintiff from seeking an injunction.

Notes. R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 1, has been amended, and it is no longer necessary to state, when making a payment into court, whether liability is admitted or denied.

As to the effect of payment into court as res judicata, see 15 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 209-211, and cases there cited.

Wood v. Leetham (1892), 61 L.J.Q.B. 215, D.C.; 13 Digest (Repl.) 460, 841.

Appeal from an order of STIRLING, J., dismissing an application by the plaintiff by summons to strike out part of the defendants' counterclaim in the action. The plaintiff claimed against nine defendants (i) damages for alleged trespass, and (ii) an injunction to restrain threatened trespass. Paragraph 1 of the statement of claim stated the title of the plaintiff to a close of land called Martin Down, part of the waste of the manor of Martin. Paragraph 2 contained the allegation of the trespass complained of, stating that on Sept. 1, 1898, the defendants wrongfully broke and entered the plaintiff's land in pursuit of game and rabbits, and did there kill game and rabbits. Threats to continue to trespass were alleged in para. 3, and that the defendants wrongfully claimed to be entitled to enter upon the plaintiff's land, and there to pursue and kill game and rabbits, and that they threatened and intended to repeat the acts complained of. By para. 1 of their defence the defendants, copyholders of the manor, or their tenants, admitted the plaintiff's title to the land in question. By para. 2 the defendants alleged that the copyholders of the manor in right of their respective tenements were, by the custom of the manor, entitled to the right and privileges for themselves and their tenants in occupation of such tenements to kill and take rabbits on and from the land in question by themselves or their servants, and their tenants or the servants of such tenants, and, alternatively, that the tenants of copyhold tenements for the time being had such right and privilege by virtue of their tenancy. By para. 3 the defendants alleged that the copyholders and their tenants, and the respective predecessors in title of the copyholders in their respective tenements, had exercised and enjoyed the rights and privileges aforesaid from time immemorial, and also for the respective periods of thirty and sixty years without interruption before the commencement of this action. The defendants further stated that two of them were tenants of copyholders, and two others servants of tenants of copyholders. They admitted that four of the defendants had gone on the land in question and killed rabbits, two as tenants of copyholders and two as servants of tenants of copyholders. The defendants then denied all the other allegations of the statement of claim, and then said, by para. 7 :

"Denying liability, each of the defendants brings into court the sum of 1s., and says that the same is sufficient to satisfy his liability to the plaintiff (if any) in respect of the matters complained of."

The two defendants who were tenants of copyholders delivered a counterclaim in which they repeated paras. 2 and 3 of the defence, and asked (i) for a declaration that they had in respect of their occupation of their copyhold tenement the rights and privileges therein mentioned, and (ii) an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from interfering with the enjoyment of such rights. The sum of 9s. was paid into court, and was taken out by the plaintiff, who gave notice, dated Feb. 22, 1899, that he accepted the sum paid in satisfaction "of the claim in respect of which it is paid in."

The plaintiff subsequently made the application before STIRLING, J., to strike out from the counterclaim the references to the statements in the defence on the ground that "they raise again upon the counterclaim matters already disposed of upon the claim." He submitted that the payment into court by the defendants was an admission that the plaintiff had a good cause of action as regarded the matters complained of therein, and in particular in para. 2 of the statement of claim; and, consequently, that the alleged rights in respect of which two of the defendants had counterclaimed could not be set up. In effect it was contended that when the plaintiff took the 9s. out of court the defendants ought to be regarded as having admitted the plaintiff's title to the lands free from any of the alleged rights claimed by the two defendants. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the plaintiff was not in any way prejudiced or embarrassed, and that the 9s. paid into court was paid in in respect of the trespass and not in respect of the whole cause of action, and that the cause of action alleged in para. 3 of the statement of claim, on the one hand, and the rights alleged by the two defendants to exist, as stated in paras. 2 and 3 of the defence and repeated in the counterclaim, were still the subject of litigation between the parties. STIRLING, J., refused the application, and the plaintiff appealed.

Butcher, Q.C., and A. à Beckett Terrell for the plaintiff.

Duke, Q.C., and Kerly for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an application by the plaintiff to strike out a portion of the defendants' counterclaim. The plaintiff is the lord of the manor. He brought an action against nine defendants for trespass and damages, and he claimed in the same action an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking game and rabbits. The defendants have put in a defence. They deny the plaintiff's right, set up a custom entitling them to take game and rabbits, in para. 7 of their defence they deny their liability, and each of them brings into court the sum of 1s. and says that the same is sufficient to satisfy his liability to the plaintiff (if any) in respect of the matters complained of. They go on to state their counterclaim. They repeat by reference their alleged custom entitling them to take game and rabbits, and they ask for a declaration that they are entitled to take game and rabbits, and for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from interfering. That being the case, the plaintiff took out the 9s. in satisfaction. He gave a proper notice in proper time, and accepted the 9s. paid into court in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it was paid in. Having done that, he seeks to stop this counterclaim and prevent the defendants from setting up the custom which they allege, on the ground that they must be treated as having estopped themselves by the admission they made by paying the money into court, from saying that he has no right to take it out in satisfaction. That would appear to me to be the legal effect of what has been done.

The money is paid into court under the Rules of the Supreme Court. The question in controversy turns on the true effect of Ord. 22, rr. 1 and 6. Order 22, r. 1, enables a defendant to pay money into court in one of two ways. It is confined to actions to recover debt or damages; it has nothing to do with ordinary injunctions. I do not say that it has nothing to do with this action, because this action is an action for damages as well as for an injunction. So far as it is an action for damages it is quite within a defendant's rights to pay the money into court. He pays it in in one of two ways under this rule. He can pay it in by way of satisfaction. If he does that, it shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made. That is what the defendants in the present case have not done. They have paid it in under the next part of the rule, which says that, instead of paying it in in that way, a defendant may with a defence denying liability pay money into court—not a word about it being, in that case, "by way of satisfaction which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action." It does not say that at all. It is obvious why. It is utterly inconsistent to say that a man may deny liability and pay money into court and admit it at the same time.

If a defendant with a defence denying liability pays money into court, then it is subject to r. 6. Rule 6 says:

"When the liability of the defendant, in respect of the claim or cause of action in satisfaction of which the payment into court has been made, is denied in the defence, the following rules shall apply: (a) The plaintiff may accept in satisfaction of the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment into court has been made the sum so paid in, in which case he shall be entitled to have the money paid out to him as hereinafter provided notwithstanding the defendant's denial of liability, whereupon all further proceedings in respect of such claim or cause of action except as to cost shall be stayed."

What does that mean? Does that mean that the plaintiff can, by taking the money out of court, treat a denial of liability as an admission of liability? Can he force the defendant to admit that which he has strenuously denied? That appears to me to be nonsense. It means what it says. It says that, if the plaintiff likes to take the money out in satisfaction, all proceedings in the action, so far as relates to the matter in respect of which the money was paid in, are at an end. The plaintiff is not to fight it out if he likes to take it in satisfaction of all damages. Then the action is stopped. One sees the sense of that from the plaintiff's point of view and the defendant's point of view. Each defendant in the present case says: "I am not going to admit your right, but it is not worth fighting so far as the damages are concerned. I shall pay 1s. into court, and get rid of it so far." He cannot get rid of it so far as the injunction is concerned.

Whether the plaintiff can in this action, as STIRLING, J., thinks he can, go on with a view to an injunction may be possibly a question. I should think he could, because you cannot properly pay into court as a defence to an injunction. You can only treat a payment into court as in respect of that regarding which it can be properly paid in—i.e., a claim for a debt or damages. Supposing that the plaintiff is not wrong so far as the injunction is concerned, what right has he to ask us to strike out the counterclaim and prevent the defendants in their counterclaim from setting up the custom on which they rely? It appears to me it would enable the plaintiff to put the defendants in a position which they have carefully avoided being put in. That is to say, the plaintiff is forcing upon the defendants an admission contrary to the protest of the defendants, who deny the whole thing.

I think that STIRLING, J.'s, view is right, and I do not think that the cases referred to have any bearing upon the present controversy. I cannot help thinking, so far as the working out of these rules is concerned, that the view taken by COTTON, L.J., in Berdan v. Greenwood (1) is right. That is to say, if the plaintiff goes on with this action for an injunction and he succeeds in establishing his right, why he should not get the costs of that controversy I cannot conceive. Neither can I conceive why the defendants should not, if they are right, set up the custom of this manor. To say that the custom of this manor cannot be investigated either now or hereafter because the plaintiff has taken this money in satisfaction of the claim for damages is illogical, unreasonable, and altogether wrong.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree with all that the Master of the Rolls has said, and I shall add only a few observations of my own. First of all, I say that Ord. 22, r. 1, is confined to the case of an action brought to recover a debt or damages. It does not mean that where an action is brought to establish a right the consequences involved in r. 1 are that that right shall be established by the payment into court of money accompanied by a denial of liability. It would be very strange if it was so. I have no doubt that the money paid in here with a denial of liability was paid in in respect of the action so far as it is an action for damages. It is contrary to the whole purport of the rule to suppose that a claim of right is settled because damages in respect of a past infringement are settled by a payment in and the taking out of the money. I can see no reason why the plaintiff should not go on with his claim to an injunction, and why the defendants should not go on with their counterclaim. I consider STIRLING, J., to have been right throughout, and as regards this appeal it is dismissed with costs.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Apportionment of dock expenses—Repairs by insurers in dry dock and survey by shipowner—Liability of owner to contribute towards expenses.

In the course of a voyage covered by a policy of marine insurance a ship sustained damage by a peril insured against, and had to go into dry dock for repairs. While she was in dock the owner took advantage of the opportunity to have her surveyed for re-classification at Lloyd's, though the time for such survey was not due. The holding of the survey did not cause the ship to be detained in the dock for any time beyond that which was necessary for completing the repairs, nor to the cost of the use of the dock.

Held: there was no principle of law that where one person got an advantage from the act of another that other was thereby entitled to contribution towards the expense of performing the act, and, therefore, the insurers had no right to a contribution by the owner towards the expense of docking and the dock dues.

Dec. 14, 1899.—The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—The sum sought to be recovered in this case is a very small one, but the principle discussed and decided is one of very far-reaching importance, and I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority C of the Court of Appeal.

The steamship Ruabon having been placed in dock for the purpose of repairs, for which the underwriters were liable, while she was in dock the owner took advantage of the opportunity to have the vessel surveyed. It is part of the agreed facts that the holding of the survey added not a farthing to the cost or a moment D to the period of time during which the execution of the repairs proceeded, and the question raised is whether the owner of the vessel is liable on any reason known to the law to bear part of the expense involved in the docking of the vessel and keeping her there while the repairs were being executed. I notice that in more than one of the judgments it is said that the owner of the vessel used the dock for his own purposes. I think that there is a fallacy in the employment of that word E “used.” He went on to his own vessel and held a survey, and I think that it is not true to say that the dock was used for his purposes at all. He took advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him by another person (the insuring company) being under contract to do that themselves which gave him an opportunity of seeing the vessel, and for which, if he had been minded to make a survey, he would have had to pay himself. But unless the phrase “using of F the dock” is explained, it seems to me to be fallacious, first, to say that he used the dock, and then to infer that, as he used the dock, he is called upon to pay for it.

I propose to examine in detail the various cases, or rather the various classes of cases, where the right to contribution has been held to be part of our law. But it seems to me a very formidable proposition indeed to say that any court has a right to enforce what may seem to them to be just, apart from common law or G statute. The courts, no doubt, will enforce the common law, and will apply it to new questions of fact which arise; but I cannot understand how it can be asserted that it is part of the common law that where one person gets some advantage from the act of another a right of contribution towards the expense of performing that act arises on behalf of the person who has done it. Many cases might be put where the generality of such a proposition would be plainly contrary to any H received principle, and to my mind the question now in debate—admitted to be absolutely novel—would not be covered by any principle known to the law, except such a general proposition as I have indicated above. I am unable to affirm that that is the condition of the common law.

The doctrine of “average” has been repeatedly held to be a rule derived from the maritime law of Rhodes. In his judgment in Strang, Steel & Co. v. Scott & I
Co. (2) LORD WATSON said (14 App. Cas. at p. 607):

“The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text as preserved by PAULUS (Dig. L. 14, tit. 2) is: ‘Si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est.’ ”

BRAMWELL, L.J., it is true in Wright v. Marwood (3), rested it upon an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested. SIR WILLIAM BALIOL BRETT,

A M.R., on the other hand, in Burton v. English (4), spoke of it as a right arising not from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, which had been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not necessary to go minutely into the arguments arising from the difference of opinion as to the origin of the law. It is, at all events, a known principle enforceable by the courts, resting either upon positive enactment adopted into our law or from an implied contract between the parties. So LORD COKE in Harbert's Case (5) explains very clearly when dealing with "contribution." He says (3 Co. Rep. at p. 146):

C "Note, reader, when it is said before and often in our books that if one purchaser be only extended for the whole debt, that he shall have contribution: it is not thereby intended that the others shall give or allow to him anything by way of contribution, but it ought to be intended that the party, who is only extended for the whole, may by audita querela or scire facias, as the case requires, defeat the execution, and thereby he shall be restored to all the mean profits, and compel the conusee to sue execution of the whole land; so in this manner everyone shall be contributory, hoc est, the land of every ter-tenant shall be equally extended."

D LORD REDESDALE in Stirling v. Forrester (6) said (3 Bli. at p. 596):

E "The decision in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7) proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries, that where several persons are debtors all shall be equal. The doctrine is illustrated in that case by the practice in questions of 'average,' etc., where there is no express contract, but equity distributes the loss equally. On the prisage of wines, it is immaterial whose wines are taken; all must contribute equally: so it is where goods are thrown overboard for the safety of the ship, the owners of the goods saved by that act must contribute proportionally to the loss. The duty of contribution extends to all persons who are within the scope of the equitable obligation."

F I know of no case in which anything like the present claim has been advanced. There is no debt here for which both the parties in question are bound to some third person. It cannot be denied that the underwriters here were themselves bound to incur all the liability they did incur, and that the shipowner was under no such liability. There is here no joint ownership which makes a liability upon all partaking of that ownership, which liability each is under an obligation to some third person to fulfil. In another part of LORD REDESDALE'S observations in Stirling v. Forrester (6) his Lordship makes clear what he means by his commentary on Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7). He says (3 Bli. at pp. 599, 591):

H "The principle established in the case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7) is universal, that the right and duty of contribution is founded in doctrines of equity; it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted and one makes the payment the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt, all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditors to exact or receive payment from one and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract but always in conscience as far as he is able, to put the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of the decision in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (7) and in that case there was no evidence of contract as in this. So in the case of land descending to coparceners, subject to a debt; if the creditor proceeds against one of the coparceners the others must contribute. If the creditor discharges one of the coparceners he cannot proceed for the whole debt against the others; at the most they are only bound to pay their proportions."

In all the cases to which I have referred, and in all the observations made by the learned judges, the liability of each of the persons held to be bound to contribute is assumed to exist either by contract or by some obligation binding them all to equality of payment or sacrifice in respect of that common obligation. But this is the first time in which it has been sought to advance that principle where there is nothing in common between the two persons, except that one person has taken advantage of something that the other person has done, there being no contract between them—there being no obligation by which each of them is bound; and the duty to contribute is alleged to arise only on some general principle of justice, that a man ought not to get an advantage unless he pays for it. So that if a man were to cut down a wood which obscured his neighbour's prospect and gave him a better view, the neighbour ought upon this principle to be compelled to contribute to cutting down the wood. Or if a man built a wall so as to shield his neighbour's house from undue wet or danger from violent tempests, he ought to be entitled to contribution because the neighbour has got an advantage from what he did. I can find no authority for any principle which includes this case. The heads of "average," "principal and surety," "joint debtor," or "ownership of lands," all of which are liable in execution and only one of which has been made the subject of execution, are intelligible heads of the law, and are included within well-known and ascertainable principles. This case seems to me to go entirely beyond those ascertained principles, and for it there would appear to be no authority. No statute has authorised it; no principle of the common law comprehends it; and I am, therefore, unable to concur with the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal.

But it remains to consider whether the case is not covered by authority. That supposed authority is to be found in what has been called the Vancouver Case—Marine Insurance Co. v. China Transpacific Co. (1). I cannot think that that case establishes any such proposition as is insisted on here. In that case the sole question was whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondent exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty. It is necessary to observe somewhat minutely the facts of that case, in order to see whether there is anything in it which affects the question now in debate. The Vancouver, the vessel in question, was insured in a time policy which contained the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." During a voyage covered by the policy she sustained certain damage not known at the time, but when some time after the owners, for their own purposes of cleaning and scraping her, put her into dock, the damage was observed then and there, and the underwriters were of course liable to make good the particular average loss for which under the policy they were liable. The question having arisen in this form, and the owners having paid the whole of the dock dues while the vessel was being scraped and cleaned, and while simultaneously the obligation of the underwriters was being fulfilled by the repair of the damage, it was argued that by the accidental circumstance of the owner having put his vessel into dock, and the underwriter having thereby escaped any liability to the dock owner for dock dues, the cost of repairs to him was brought under the agreed amount of 3 per cent.

What the court had to determine was the liability under the policy in question, and with reference to that question which, be it observed, is to be measured by what the damage would cost to repair, the court held that the dock dues were part of the cost, and that under the circumstances, as the operations were simultaneously performed, the cost should be attributed (let the phrases be noted) in moieties to the operations of those two persons interested. The owner paid the dock dues, and if he had not done so the underwriter would undoubtedly have had to pay for dock dues, and if he had, the amount paid would have been over 3 per cent. It came, in fact, to a calculation of the extent of the damage done, and, that being measured by its cost of repair, it was held that the 3 per cent. was reached. What LORD HERSHELL meant is, I think, sufficiently explained

A by what he says in commenting on Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co. (8), as to the mode in which the particular average loss was to be arrived at in that case. He says (11 App. Cas. at p. 590):

B "All the judges were, I think, agreed that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled as a general rule to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances."

D The facts found in that case which is relied on were that the vessel was put into dry dock on Jan. 4, 1876. It was discovered on the afternoon of the same day that her stern post was broken. It was found by the special case that if the vessel had required nothing but scraping and cleaning, the purpose for which alone she was put there by her owners, she might have been finished and discharged by the evening of Jan. 6, whereas for the purposes of her repair, for which the underwriters were responsible, she required the whole time from Jan. 4 to 11, when in fact she was discharged. How a mode of thus calculating the particular average loss so as to justify the contract between the two parties to it can justify such a proposition as is here insisted on, I am wholly unable either to understand or to agree to, and I think the judgment in the present case should be reversed.

E LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I concur. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that there is no principle of law which requires that a person should contribute to an outlay merely because he has derived a material benefit from it, nor is there, I think, any authority to be found for the application of such a proposition, unless it is to be found in the Vancouver Case (1). The Vancouver Case (1) has been supposed to go some way in that direction in a question between shipowner and underwriter, where ship's repairs and underwriter's repairs are carried out simultaneously. But it must be borne in mind that the question for decision in that case was

F "whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondents exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty contained in a policy of assurance underwritten by the appellants,"

G and that (as LORD HERSCHELL was careful to point out) was the sole question for decision. It was not decided that the shipowner was liable for one half the cost of the use of the dock, including dock charges, but that the underwriter in respect of his obligation was liable at least for one half of the cost. That was enough in the particular case to give the victory to the shipowner, and in this House he could not have asked for more.

H LORD MORRIS concurred.

I LORD DAVEY.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD BRAMPTON. It expresses my opinion so much better than I could express it myself that I will not trouble your Lordships with any observations of my own.

LORD BRAMPTON.—I entirely concur in the opinion which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I take the general rule to be correctly stated by LORD HERSCHELL in the Vancouver Case (1) (11 App. Cas. at p. 590):

"that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances"

as the measure of his loss. I take it also as admitted that, but for the matter which I am about to mention, it would not be disputed that the respondents were liable under their policy to pay as an indemnity against the loss by perils of the sea which occurred, the full sum of £82 5s. claimed. This represents prima facie their responsibility. The respondents seek to reduce this amount by the sum of £2 5s. by reason of a survey of the ship which the plaintiffs, the owners, caused to be made by Lloyd's surveyor, during the period in which the vessel was under repair on the pontoon, which, for this purpose, I may call a dry dock. If they are right in making a reduction on this account, no question being raised as to the amount, the respondents are entitled to retain the judgment pronounced in their favour by the majority of the Court of Appeal.

Since the decision of the Vancouver Case (1), by which, of course, we are bound, and which to me seems to be founded on good sense, it is not, in my opinion, open to question that where two operations are essentially necessary to be performed upon the hull of the ship in order to render her in a condition to justify a prudent owner in sending her again to sea, one of such operations being to effect repairs for the cost of which underwriters are responsible—the other to clean and scrape the ship necessitated by wear and tear, the cost of which must be borne by the owners themselves, neither of which operations could be performed unless the ship were drydocked, and both of which operations the owners and underwriters, or owners acting for themselves and also for the underwriters, deem it expedient should be performed at one and the same time, or that one should immediately follow the other without any substantial interval under one continuous drydocking, in such cases the cost of docking and all dock dues during the period in which the vessel is in dock must be shared in proportion, having regard to the period of joint or separate actual use of it. I do not, however, find anything in the Vancouver Case (1) which would justify such a division of dock dues, unless in such cases as I have mentioned.

The present is a very different case. The Ruaban was drydocked solely to enable the underwriters to effect the repairs for which they were liable and with no other object, and no other repair was, in fact, done or required to be done on the ship; the survey of Lloyd's surveyor was in no way necessary for any purpose connected with the work performed on the vessel, but was only made to entitle the owners to re-classification at Lloyd's, and need not have been made at that moment, nor at any particular time, so long as it was made within the time limited by Lloyd's rules, which had then nine months to run. It is quite true that if it had not then been made it would have been necessary if the vessel were afterwards surveyed to have incurred the expense of again drydocking her at the owners' expense, and to that extent the owners might have been benefited. I say might, because the owners might have sold the vessel in the meantime, or some other thing might have occurred to render such survey unnecessary. Assuming, however, that the expense of another drydocking was in this way saved, and that to that extent the owners were benefited, I think that circumstance immaterial, and it does not warrant a claim for contribution towards the dock dues imperatively incurred on the underwriters' account in the discharge of their obligations.

I think that such contribution can only be insisted upon in those cases where work is done to the vessel itself by two or more persons, each separately and simultaneously engaged under different obligations in doing portions of it, dry-docking being necessary for each. If the respondents' claim for contribution were allowed, I see no reason why such a claim might not be made against an owner who, while his ship was in dry dock sold her, subject to immediate inspection and surveyor by his purchaser. A variety of other cases similar in character might be suggested. I think that the owners, in causing the survey to be made in this case, were taking what LORD HERSCHELL termed "an incidental advantage" from the fact that a damage arising from a risk within the policy had necessitated repairs at the expense of the underwriter; and he puts by way of illustration the case

A of a vessel in ordinary course requiring scraping and painting at intervals of five years, and before the time for such operation has arrived meeting with a disaster by perils of the sea and docked for repairs for which underwriters were responsible, and the shipowner taking the opportunity of scraping and painting his ship. In repudiating the notion that the entire time occupied in that operation should be borne by the shipowner, he adds, "if they were to be borne by him at all." This observation of that noble and learned Lord makes it clear to me that he did not contemplate his judgment covering such a case as this, where nothing was in fact done on the ship, and the survey did not in the smallest degree delay the completion or add one farthing to the expense of the repairs done for the underwriter. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

WEST OF ENGLAND FIRE INSURANCE CO. v. ISAACS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), November 25, 1896]

[Reported [1897] 1 Q.B. 226; 66 L.J.Q.B. 36; 75 L.T. 564]

G

The lessor of premises covenanted to insure against fire and to expend any insurance money received in making good damage by fire. The lessee covenanted to repair and insure the premises with the plaintiffs. A fire occurred and the lessee received from the plaintiffs £100 the full amount of the loss. He did not make good the damage. The lease expired, and the lessor sued the lessee for breach of the covenant to repair. That action was compromised by the lessee paying £140 and undertaking not to sue upon the lessor's covenant in the lease. The lessor subsequently received £100 from the insurance company with which he had insured the premises.

H

Held: by acting as he had the lessee had put it out of his power to make any claim against the lessor; he had thereby destroyed the plaintiffs' right to have his right of action under the covenant in the lease subrogated to them; and, therefore, they were entitled to the return of the £100 which they had paid to him.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., reported [1896] 2 Q.B. 377, at the trial of the action by him as a commercial cause.

Premises were demised for a term to expire in December, 1894, by a lease which contained covenants by the lessee to repair and to yield up in repair, and to insure the premises against fire in the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation in the joint names of the lessor and lessee. In 1885 the then lessee demised to the defendant a part of the premises, being a warehouse, for the residue of the term, less ten days. The sublease contained covenants by the sub-lessee to repair and yield up in repair, and a covenant by the sub-lessor (lessee under the head lease) to insure the premises and to lay out the money received under any policy of insurance in making good any damage by fire, with a proviso

“that the sub-lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, should remain liable, under the general covenant to repair thereinbefore contained, to make good any damage which the money received by virtue of any such insurance should be inadequate to repair.”

The lessee insured the premises in the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation for £800. The defendant insured the premises demised to him in the plaintiff company for £800. The lease became vested in one Jones for the residue of the term. On July 18, 1893, the premises demised to the defendant were damaged by fire. The amount of the damage was agreed to be £100 by both the insurance companies and by the defendant. On Mar. 28, 1894, the plaintiff company paid the defendant £100 in respect of the loss sustained by him by reason of the fire. The defendant did not repair the premises. The lease having expired in December, 1894, the lessor, on Jan. 9, 1895, brought an action against Jones for damages for breach of the covenant to repair and yield up in repair, and on Jan. 19, Jones brought a similar action against the defendant. The first action was settled by the payment of £240. The second action was settled on April 4, 1895, by the defendant paying to Jones £140 in settlement of all claims for dilapidations, the defendant undertaking not to bring any action against Jones for breaches of the covenants in the sub-lease to the defendant. On April 19, 1895, Jones obtained payment of £100 from the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation in respect of the damage by fire. The plaintiff company then brought this action to recover £100 from the defendant, upon the ground that in the settlement with Jones he had given up a right against Jones to the benefit of which the plaintiff company was entitled. HENN COLLINS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs and the defendant appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Wood Hill for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case a set of premises, which at one time are called a warehouse and at another time a stable, was insured against fire in two fire insurance offices, in each of them to the extent of at least £100. There has been a fire, and in respect of that fire each of the insurance offices has paid £100. The question is whether, in that state of things, the decision of HENN COLLINS, J., in favour of the plaintiffs was right.

Many cases have been cited which go into the whole doctrine of subrogation, but this case seems to me to be capable of solution upon well-known doctrines which are not very difficult to state. What is the doctrine here, simply stated? This is an action by the West of England Fire Insurance Co. against the defendant, who was the assured under a policy granted to him by that office. They say that he insured these premises in their office against fire; that a fire has taken place; and that the fire produced damage to the extent of £100. They do not say they were not bound to pay him; they say that they were bound to pay him upon that policy and did pay him, and, therefore, the matter was settled between them. But then they say that, if he had any remedy in respect of that fire against anybody else, if he had any right of action, inasmuch as they had paid him the whole loss, the doctrine of insurance law is that any remedy he had against anybody in respect of that damage is subrogated to them; that they, therefore, as between him and them, had a right to have the advantage of it, and, after they had paid him the whole loss which was insured in that office, he had no right to go and deal with those claims which he might have had, but which were subrogated to them. That doctrine is not disputed.

What happened as between these plaintiffs and this defendant? They did pay him the whole sum insured in respect of this loss by fire. They, therefore, had subrogated to them any right which he might have against anybody in respect of that fire, and after they had paid him he had no right to deal with those rights which he might otherwise have had, but which now were subrogated to them. But he did deal with those rights. He had a right against one Jones, who was at that time in the position of being the lessor, in respect of a covenant contained in the lease which provided that he would insure these premises against a loss by fire, and that the lessor, if a fire occurred and the insurance money was paid, would expend that money, as far as might be necessary, in restoring the damage done by the fire. The contract between the parties at the time of this fire was that Jones had taken upon himself the fulfilment of that covenant in the lease, which had been assigned to him, and the defendant had agreed to be the tenant upon those terms. The plaintiffs paid the defendant, who was assured in their office. It seems to me impossible to doubt that they were bound to pay him. They never disputed their liability to pay him, and they paid him.

What, according to insurance law, were their rights immediately after they paid? Their rights were to have any claim, which he could make against anybody in respect of that fire, subrogated to them, or, to use another word, transferred to them; that is to say, that, according to insurance law, he was immediately bound to lend his name to them, in order that they might in his name bring any action in diminution of the loss which he could maintain against anybody. Has he interfered with that right of theirs to have subrogation? They say that he has; that he has made an arrangement or a compromise with the person against whom he had that right, Jones, so that he could not now bring any action against him; that, if he cannot bring an action against him now, he cannot subrogate that action to them; and that he has thus destroyed the right which they had to have his right of action subrogated. They contend that that is a breach of their right and of the duty he owed them, which was not to interfere with their subrogated rights.

Is it true that he has compromised the right which he had? He had a right against Jones, who was in the position of lessor to him that Jones would keep up the insurance of the premises with the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, the effect of which was that, in case of fire, the insurance company would pay to Jones the amount of the loss. Secondly, he had a right to say that Jones had a claim against the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, that they had never disputed their liability to pay, and that they had paid him in respect of the fire. That of itself would not give the defendant any right; but Jones had further covenanted that, if and when the Royal Exchange should pay him, he would spend the money in putting the premises to rights. If that had been carried out and the premises had been put to rights before the plaintiffs had been called upon to pay, according to insurance law they, who were only liable to indemnify the defendant, would have had nothing to pay to him because the loss to him, which was the loss of the premises, or of the use of the premises, would have been made good under the covenant by Jones expending the money which he had the right to receive and did receive from the Royal Exchange.

The plaintiffs say that they were entitled to that right, and that the defendant was bound to leave them to insist upon that right of his as against Jones; that is to say, his right to say to Jones that he had broken his covenant because he had received the money from the Royal Exchange and had not expended it to make good the damage. They say that, if they had been subrogated into the defendant's place, they could have sued Jones for his breach of covenant, and could have recovered

£100, the amount, as agreed by them all, of the damage by the fire. The plaintiffs A assert that the defendant's interference with their rights by compromising the case and giving up his rights of action against Jones, has damaged them to the extent of £100. That is the law acted upon by the learned judge, and it seems to me that that law is perfectly right. The law is that, when two insurance companies have insured the same thing, against the same loss, they cannot both be called upon to pay. It will only be the Royal Exchange which will bear the loss. The present plaintiffs B have paid £100 to the defendant and will get back their £100 from the defendant. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. I wish to say a few words about the position of the lessor C and the lessee. Under this lease there was what was called by the parties a general covenant to repair and to yield up in repair; but a special proviso was made for the case of damage by fire, and that was that the lessor should insure against damage by fire, and that he should lay out all moneys received in respect of such insurance in rebuilding or reinstating the premises so destroyed or damaged. That was an absolute covenant to spend all the moneys received, that is £100 in this instance. D Then comes this proviso :

“Provided always nevertheless that the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall remain liable under the general covenant to repair hereinbefore contained to make good any damage which the moneys received by virtue of any such insurance shall be inadequate to repair.” E

That was the measure of his liability. There was none other. The liability, therefore, was for not making good the amount of damage which the £100 was insufficient to meet. This is not a case of technicalities. I do not see any difficulty in which a pleader would be. In substance the liability of the lessee to the lessor was to make good any damage that the £100 would not cover. He must get that £100 allowed, but he has so dealt with the lessor that no one can now get the £100, for he has F already got the full benefit of that £100. He paid £140 without requiring that diminution of liability to which he was entitled. He so dealt with the insurance that the plaintiffs cannot have their right of subrogation, and they are entitled to recover the £100.

Charity—Accumulation of fund—Absolute gift of capital and income—Right of charity to immediate payment of fund—Application of rule in Saunders v. Vautier—Thellusson Act, 1800 (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 1.

A testator, who died in 1865, bequeathed by his will certain annuities. He directed that in case the income of his trust estate should not be sufficient to pay the whole of the annuities in any year, they should abate rateably; that the surplus income, if any, should be invested; and that, after the decease of the last surviving annuitant, the trustees should convert the trust estate and stand possessed of the moneys and the accumulations in trust to divide the same among five charitable institutions. After providing for the annuities there was a large surplus income, which was accumulated and invested by the trustees.

Held: the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1) (1841), Cr. & Ph. 240, that where there is an absolute vested interest made payable in a future certain event, with a direction to accumulate the interest in the meantime and pay it with the principal, the court will not enforce the trust for accumulation in which no person has any interest except the beneficiary, applied where the beneficiaries were charitable corporations or trustees of charities as it did to individual beneficiaries; the Accumulations Act, 1800 (the Thellusson Act) [repealed] had no application to the present case; and, therefore, the charities were entitled to stop the accumulation and have immediate payment of the fund.

The bill was filed in April, 1865, by the executors of J. F. Duncan, who died in January in that year, for the administration of his estate. The material provisions of the will of the testator, which was made in 1860, appear in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor (infra). The personal estate amounted to nearly £26,000, and there was a large surplus income after providing for the annuities bequeathed by the will. The case came before WICKENS, V.-C., in 1871, and he decided (L.R. 12 Eq. 559) that the charities were entitled to the whole of the residuary estate, not only to £100 each, and to the surplus which had accumulated, amounting at that time to about £8,000, but he declined to give any direction as to future accumulations, expressing some doubt whether the doctrine of Saunders v. Vautier (1) applied to a gift to a charitable institution. The next of kin, who had not been parties to these proceedings, now petitioned that the accumulations which had accumulated after the lapse of twenty-one years from the death of the testator should be paid to them. STIRLING, J., decided against them, holding that the doctrine of Saunders v. Vautier (1) applied, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his judgment, and also that of WICKENS, V.-C., from which the next of kin had obtained leave to appeal also. They appealed to the House of Lords.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., Hopkinson, Q.C., and T. Ribton (Graham Hastings, Q.C., with them) for the next of kin.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Dickinson for the charities named in the will.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 19, 1895. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The first question which arises in this case is whether the charities named in the will of John Francis Duncan are entitled (subject to annuities which he thereby created) to the residue of his estate, or only to the sums specified in his will in connection with each of the charities. The ultimate trust of the residue is in these terms :

“In trust to pay and divide the same unto the several public charities herein-after named according to the amounts set after their respective names—that is to say, to the treasurer for the time being of an institution known by the name of the London Orphan Asylum for the reception and education of destitute orphans established in London, £100; to the Public Dispensary, Carey Street, near Lincoln's Inn, £100; to the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's Inn Road, £100; to the King's College Hospital in Carey Street, Lincoln's Inn, £100; and to an institution under the patronage of the late Lord Mayor of London, Alderman Wire, the sum of £100 for the benefit of persons afflicted with paralysis.”

A The matter came before WICKENS, V.-C., for decision in 1871. He held that the charities had made good their claim to be residuary legatees of the testator's personal estate, and not merely legatees of five sums of £100 each. The Court of Appeal refused to disturb that finding, and I see no reason to differ from the view hitherto taken. The trust being

B "to pay and divide the residue unto the several charities hereinafter named according to the amounts set after their respective names," it seems to me impossible to suppose that the testator intended to limit their rights to the specific sums mentioned. The only reasonable construction is, I think, that which has been put upon the clause.

C The other questions raised by the next of kin, who are the present appellants, are not so simple. The testator directed the surplus income of his residuary estate, after satisfying the annuities which he provided for, to be accumulated, and after the death of the surviving annuitant he bequeathed the capital and the accumulations upon the trust, the terms of which I have quoted. Some of the annuitants are still living. It is contended for the appellants that they, as next of kin, are entitled to all the accumulations which have accrued subsequently to the period for which, under the provisions of Thellusson's Act, accumulation could lawfully be directed. D It has first to be determined whether, upon the true construction of the will, the surplus income accumulated and the interest accruing from these accumulations, when invested, were charged with the payment of the annuities. This depends, of course, upon the intention of the testator, to be derived from the language used in his will. He bequeaths to trustees all the residue of his personal estate, which he E thereafter calls "the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities," and directs them, "from and out of the annual income of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities," to pay the annuities which he specifies, subject to a proviso in the following terms :

F "Provided always that in case the annual income of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities shall not be sufficient, for the payment of the whole amount of the said annuities, then it is my will and desire, and I direct my said trustees or trustee, when and as often as the same shall happen, to apportion the deficiency between and amongst the said annuitants according to the amount of their respective annuities and so as that the same shall rateably abate accordingly."

G Then follows a further trust :

H "In every year after my decease to invest the surplus income, if any, of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and from and after the decease of the survivor of the annuitants to convert into money all such parts of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and the accumulations thereof respectively as shall not consist of cash, and to stand possessed of the money to arise from the conversion, and also such parts of the trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and the accumulations thereof as shall consist of cash, upon trust to pay and divide them amongst the charities named."

I Having regard to the language used, I do not think it is possible to hold that the annuitants have any claim to be satisfied out of the accumulations of surplus income. But for the provision for abatement it might have been contended (and probably successfully contended) that such a right existed, but it seems to me to be expressly excluded by the abatement clause. It is true that there is no provision for the investment of the income derived from the accumulation of the surplus income, unless it be deduced from the use of the word "accumulation" in the clause which precedes the ultimate trust; but whether this be so or not, I think that the income arising from the investment of surplus income must, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, follow the destination of the investments from which it results. For these reasons it appears to me that the charities have a vested interest A in the surplus income, and the accretions resulting from the investment of that surplus income. The testator, however, undoubtedly intended to postpone the enjoyment of his bounty by these beneficiaries until the death of the last annuitant. The courts below have, notwithstanding this, determined that the beneficiaries are entitled to the immediate enjoyment of all that is not made by the will subject to the payment of the annuities. This is, to my mind, the only point of any difficulty. B

The courts proceeded on the doctrine acted upon in Saunders v. Vautier (1), which has been since often recognised. Wood, V.-C., in Gosling v. Gosling (2), expounded the doctrine thus (John. at p. 272) :

“The principle of this court has always been to recognise the right of all persons who attain the age of twenty-one to enter upon the absolute use and C enjoyment of the property given to them by a will, notwithstanding any directions by the testator to the effect that they are not to enjoy it until a later age, unless during the interval the property is given for the benefit of another. If the property is once theirs, it is useless for the testator to attempt to impose any fetter upon their enjoyment of it in full so soon as they attain twenty-one. And upon that principle, unless there is in the will, or in some codicil to it, a D clear indication of an intention on the part of the testator not only that his devisees are not to have the enjoyment of the property he has devised to them until they attain twenty-five, but that some other person is to have that enjoyment, or unless the property is so clearly taken away from the devisees up to the time of their attaining twenty-five as to induce the court to hold that, as to the previous rents and profits, there has been an intestacy, the court does not E hesitate to strike out of the will any direction that the devisees shall not enjoy it in full until they attain the age of twenty-five years.”

The point seems, in the first instance, to have been rather assumed than decided. It was apparently regarded as a necessary consequence of the conclusion that a gift had vested, that the enjoyment of it must be immediate on the beneficiary becoming sui juris, and could not be postponed until a later date unless the testator had made F some other destination of the income during the intervening period. It is needless to inquire whether the courts might have given effect to the intention of the testator in such cases to postpone the enjoyment of his bounty to a time fixed by himself subsequent to the attainment by the objects of his bounty of their majority. The doctrine has been so long settled and so often recognised that it would not be proper now to question it. WICKENS, V.-C., when this case came before him in 1871, G intimated an opinion that the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1) was inapplicable where the beneficiaries were charitable corporations or the trustees of charities. I have carefully considered the reasons which he adduced for this opinion with the respect due to any opinion of that learned judge, and certainly with no indisposition to give effect to the intention of the testator if I could see my way to do so. But I am unable to find any sound basis upon which a distinction can be rested in this respect H between bequests to charities and those made in favour of individual beneficiaries. I concur, therefore, in the conclusion at which the courts below arrived. The Thellusson Act has, in my opinion, for the reasons given, no application to the case. I think the judgment should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the I order of the Court of Appeal is perfectly right. As regards the construction of the testator's will, I do not think that there is any difficulty. The five charities are clearly the testator's residuary legatees. The gift to them is awkwardly expressed. The awkwardness, however, I think arises merely from the fact that in the result they are found to take equally, though the will appears to have been prepared with a view to an unequal distribution. It may be that, when the instructions for the will were given, the testator had not finally determined the shares in which the ultimate objects of his bounty were to take, and that he wished to leave the matter open till

A the last moment. But however that may be, there is only one result which can be brought out from the language which the testator has used. Then I think that the testator's will shows an anxious desire that the annuities should only be paid out of the income accruing from year to year on the corpus or capital of the testator's residuary estate as it subsisted at the time of his death. The intention seems to have been that the accounts should be closed at the end of each year. If there
B was a deficiency the annuitants were to bear the loss, and the annuities were to abate rateably. If there was a surplus the surplus was to be put aside for the benefit of the residuary legatees. Under no circumstances, as it appears to me, were the annuitants to be at liberty to resort to the income of a future year for the purpose of making good a past deficiency. At the same time it is clear, on the face of the will, that the testator did not mean the residuary legatees to receive any part of
C what the will gives them until the death of the last annuitant. If the residuary legatees were individuals, there could not be the slightest doubt that they would be entitled to call upon the trustees to hand over to them, at the end of each year, the surplus income of the testator's residuary estate. Does the fact that the residuary legatees are charities make any difference? Notwithstanding the doubt expressed by WICKENS, V.-C., when the case was before him in 1871, I do not think that it
D does. The charities alone are interested in the surplus income accruing from year to year. Their interest is vested and indefeasible; and they may legally apply what they take under the bequest either as capital or as income. That being so, I agree with the reasoning of STIRLING, J., and the Court of Appeal. In regard to the questions which have arisen on this will, I am unable to see any substantial distinction, between the case of an incorporated charity and a charity not incorporated,
E or between the case of a charity and an individual.

LORD DAVEY (read by LORD WATSON).—This case arises on the will of a testator named John Francis Duncan, who died on Jan. 1, 1865. The contest is between the conflicting claims of the testator's next of kin and those of five charitable institutions
F named in his will to the accumulations of the surplus income of the testator's residuary estate subsequent to Jan. 1, 1886, being the expiration of twenty-one years from his death, and the accruing surplus income until the death of the surviving annuitant named in the will, and also to the capital of the estate on the expiration of that period. I observe from the proceedings in the suit that two of the annuitants were infants on May 25, 1868, so that, on a moderate estimate of probabilities, the
G period in question may extend some way into the next century. The case came originally before WICKENS, V.-C., in the year 1871. At that time, however, the next of kin had not been ascertained and their present claims were represented by the Crown. The next of kin have since been ascertained, and are the appellants at your Lordships' bar. The Court of Appeal (affirming the judgment of STIRLING, J.) have decided (i) that the five charities are entitled to, and when the charge of the annuities
H on the income has run off will be able to receive, the corpus of the residuary estate; (ii) that the annuities are charged only on the annual income of the estate de anno in annum, and that the annuitants have no right to have the deficiency of the income of any one year to pay their annuities made good out of the accumulations of the surplus income of past years; (iii) that the surplus income of each year is given away to other objects free from any claim of the annuitants; (iv) that what is known
I as the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1) is applicable where the donees, or legatees, are charities, as where they are individuals.

On the first point your Lordships did not think it necessary to call upon the respondents' counsel. All the judges before whom this case has come, including the late WICKENS, V.-C., have held that the will contains a gift of the capital of the estate to the charities, and that they are not confined to £100 each. I agree in that conclusion, and I have nothing to add to the reasons given in the courts below and what has been said by your Lordships. The next point is one of construction also. The testator gives the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust either to permit the said residue, thereafter called "the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, A and securities," to remain in the state of investment in which the same might be at the time of his death; but, if absolutely necessary, to vary the same, or any part thereof, into or for others of the same or a like nature. I agree with the argument of the respondents that the trust fund so constituted consists only of the capital funds which formed the residue of his estate as at the time of the testator's death, and does not include any subsequent income, or income of accumulations. The B testator then declares the trusts of the annual income of his "said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities," first to pay a legacy of £100, then to pay an annuity of £500 to his wife during her life by half-yearly payments, the first of such payments to be made six months after his decease, showing that it is the income of the estate from his death that he is dealing with, and another annuity of £50. Then C he directs that after his decease the following annuities be paid, and names a number of annuitants.

Pausing there, it might be contended consistently with well-known authorities that the annuities are charged upon the capital, or at any rate upon the income of every year until they are satisfied. But then comes the abatement clause, which it is unnecessary to read again. This clause points to a recurring deficiency, "when D and so often as the same shall happen," and it appears to me to negative any charge upon the corpus of the estate, or upon any surplus income of past years, or right to resort to the accumulations of such surplus income to make good the deficiency in any year. Whether it does not also negative any right to resort to the income of any future year to make up the deficiency of past years it is immaterial to consider, as it would only affect the amount of what is called the "surplus income," E and the question does not arise.

The will then proceeds in these words,

"and upon further trust that they my said trustees or trustee do and shall in every year after my decease invest the surplus income, if any, of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, whether such surplus shall arise from the falling in or determination of any annuity, or otherwise." F

After the decease of the survivor of the annuitants he directs a sale of such part of the trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and the accumulations thereof, as shall not consist of cash, and give the proceeds, and also such part of the said trust moneys, etc., and the accumulations thereof as shall consist of cash, upon trusts which, as I have said, import a gift to the charities. In this will I am of opinion G that the testator has carefully confined the rights of the annuitants to the annual income accruing de anno in annum of his capital residuary estate, and has dealt with the surplus income in each year as it accrued, upon different trusts, and as a distinct subject of gift. It is said that the will contains no direction to invest the income of the investments of the surplus income. There is no express direction, but, in my opinion, there is an implied direction to be found as well in the use of the H word "accumulation," which in this connection imports a continuous process of rolling up, as in the general rule of equity which imposes upon trustees the duty of investing trust funds in their hands, of which the testator has not directed an immediate disposition. And I think that the accumulations comprise the whole fund created by the investment and re-investment by way of compound interest of the surplus income, and the income derived from it. I

It is, however, suggested at the Bar that the income of investments of surplus income falls back into the original trust fund, and follows the destination of the income of it, and is, therefore, subject to a trust for the annuitants. In my opinion, this is not so. When there is no express trust declared of the income of a trust fund, it follows the destination of, and is an accretion to, the fund from which it is derived, unless there be words excluding that implication. But the source of the income in question is the investments of the surplus income, so that, even if it be not impliedly given by force of the term "accumulations," it would go in the same

A way as the investments of the surplus income, that is, to the charities. I am, therefore, of opinion that the annuitants have no charge upon the surplus income or the investments of it, or the income derived from such investments, all of which, I think, are included in the accumulations, and the charities have a vested title free from any claim by any other person to the surplus income; but, according to the directions of the will, their enjoyment is postponed to the death of the survivor of the annuitants, and an accumulation is directed in the meantime.

This being so, the principle of Saunders v. Vautier (1) would at once be applicable if this were the case of a gift to an individual. That principle is this: that where there is an absolute vested interest made payable at a future certain event, with a direction to accumulate the interest in the meantime and pay it with the principal, the court will not enforce the trust for accumulation in which no person has any interest but the legatee; or, in other words, the court holds that the legatee may put an end to an accumulation which is exclusively for his benefit. The principle is stated, as well as elsewhere, by Wood, V.-C., in the passage from his judgment in Gosling v. Gosling (2). There is no condition precedent to happen or to be performed in order to perfect the title of the legatees, and there is no other person who has any interest in the execution of the trust for accumulation, or can complain of its non-execution.

The reason for the rule has been variously stated. It may be observed, however, that the Court of Chancery always leant against the postponement of vesting or possession, or the imposition of restrictions on the enjoyment of an absolute vested interest. But it is said that there is a difference in the case of charities, and although there is no authority on the point, WICKENS, V.C., expressed some doubt upon it when it came before him in 1871. What he said was this:

“But having regard to the form of the will, though the annuities are carefully secured, I do not think I can order a division of the fund at present. If the residuary legatees were five individuals I should probably do so, there being nothing in the Thellusson Act to prevent it. But the legatees being charities, am I entitled to stop the accumulation? If a sum of money be given to be accumulated, say for ten years, and then to a charity, is the charity, whether corporate or unincorporate, entitled to claim the money at once? There may be sound reasons for deferring the enjoyment. A testator may think that the charity has a certain provision during the present generation of subscribers, and that it will not want any additional provision. And it is obvious that, though the charity remains the same, yet, if the gift is to take effect ten years hence, a different class of persons will be benefited. It does not appear that all these charities have perpetual existence, but the distinction between an incorporated and unincorporated charity is too refined to be relied on.”

Your Lordships, will, I am sure, regard any dictum, or even doubt, expressed by WICKENS, V.-C., on a subject of this kind with the greatest respect and attention. But I must confess that I do not, on the fullest consideration, find sufficient grounds for the Vice-Chancellor's doubt. It is easy, of course, to speculate on the testator's motives in postponing the enjoyment of a vested interest, and it is at least as easy to suggest motives for such a direction in the case of an individual as in the case of a charity. Nor can the possible difference in actual recipients of the testator's bounty make any distinction. An individual may die or become bankrupt during the period of accumulation. It is difficult to attribute to the testator a particular regard for the object of the charity, it may be in the middle of the next century, or respect for the persons who may then be the trustees or the managers of the charity. And I think it unsound to make the application of a canon of construction as to the effect of particular words in a will dependent on circumstances affecting the quality or character of the donee. It will be observed that, in the present case, the gift is to each charity in a form which would enable the managers to spend the amount as income, or deal with it as they might think fit. We have not to deal with a fund to be created by accumulations and settled as a capital endowment at a future time, as to which different considerations would arise. A

I am, therefore, of opinion that there is no effective direction for accumulation of any part of the surplus income in this will, and, therefore, the Thellusson Act has no application to it, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. The appellants' counsel indeed argued that the charities might be entitled for the twenty-one years after the testator's death, but that in consequence of the Thellusson Act, the subsequent surplus income was undisposed of. I find a difficulty in grasping the argument, because the Thellusson Act does not give anything to anybody, but merely vitiates the direction for accumulation beyond the prescribed period. But the conclusive answer is that, if there is no effective or enforceable direction for accumulation independently of the Act, then the Act has no application to the case. The cases cited by counsel for the appellants do not seem to me to support his argument. They are cases in which the class could not be determined until the happening of the event upon which the fund was made payable, as in Green v. Gascoyne (3); or the shares of the legatees, though vested, were liable to be defeated by the happening of some event before the time for payment, as in Eyre v. Marsden (4); or the gift itself was contingent upon the happening of an event, such as the death of a person without male issue, as in M'Donald v. Bryce (5). B C D

In Weatherall v. Thornburgh (6), the fund and accumulations were made a security for the payment of certain legacies on the happening of the given event, and the persons claiming were, therefore, only entitled to an undetermined and uncertain surplus, if any, which might be left of the fund after payment of the legacies. This is the ground stated by COTTON, L.J., and I think by JAMES, L.J., also. In Talbot v. Jevvers (7) the annuities were clearly charged by the words of the will on the whole estate, capital and income, and the accumulation was directed only for a stated period, 'or so much of it as the law will allow.' There was, therefore, on the face of the will, no disposition of the intermediate surplus income after the expiration of the twenty-one years. The doctrine of Saunders v. Vautier (1) did not apply, because the annuitants had an interest in the income, and, according to the scheme of the will, the residuary legatees could not take it except in the form of accumulations. I think that the decision of BACON, V.-C., can be supported on this ground. In the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to express any opinion on the point which was argued that, even if the annuitants had a charge on the income derived from investments of the surplus income, and the doctrine of Saunders v. Vautier (1), were, therefore, excluded, the charities would still be entitled to the surplus income after the expiration of the twenty-one years under the words of the Thellusson Act. I agree with your Lordships that the appeal shall be dismissed with costs. E F G

Annuity—Residue—Annuity charged on residue—Payment of annuity secured—Ample sum set apart—Distribution of residue.

When ample provision has been made, by a sufficient sum being set apart, to secure the payment of an annuity which is given by the will of a testator and charged on residue, the court in the administration of the estate has jurisdiction to order the residue to be distributed among the residuary legatees, and this course will be adopted even in a case where the annuitant opposes.

Solicitor—Misconduct—Appeal brought, not in interest of client, but to benefit himself—Costs between himself and client disallowed—Order for payment to client of costs of unsuccessful appeal—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11.

A solicitor brought to the Court of Appeal an appeal from the decision of a judge of the Chancery Division, not in the interest of his client, but to benefit himself by enabling him to impose terms on the respondents to the appeal which would relieve him from a personal undertaking into which he had entered to pay certain costs. He informed his client that he would "take the burden of the appeal on myself and at the same time any benefit." The appeal having been dismissed,

Held: the solicitor had incurred costs "improperly and without any reasonable cause" within R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11, and the court would order that such costs should be disallowed between him and his client and that he should repay to his client any costs which the client had been ordered to pay to the respondents to the appeal.

Appeal from an order made by STIRLING, J., on a petition brought by charities, beneficiaries under a will, for the payment to them of funds in court. B

By his will, dated July 5, 1860, John Francis Duncan, after making certain dispositions not material to be mentioned, bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust that they should either permit the moneys, stocks, funds, and securities constituting the same, to remain in their then state of investment, or to vary them, and to pay certain annuities therein mentioned. The testator then directed that in case the annual income of the trust funds should not be sufficient for the payment of the whole amount of the annuities in any year, the trustees, when and so often as the same should happen, should apportion the deficiency between and among the annuitants according to the amount of their respective annuities, so that the same should rateably abate accordingly. The testator then directed that the trustees should, in every year after his decease, invest the surplus income, if any, of the trust funds whether such surplus should arise from the falling in or determination of any annuity or annuities thereinbefore given or otherwise, and from and after the decease of the survivor of the annuitants should sell, dispose of, and convert into money all such part of the trust funds (and the accumulations thereof respectively as should not actually consist of cash), and stand possessed of the moneys to arise from such sale, disposition, and conversion, and also of such part of the trust funds and the accumulations thereof respectively as should not consist of actual cash, in trust to pay and divide the same among a number of specified charities. The testator died in January, 1865. C

In April, 1865, a bill was filed by his executors for the administration of his estate. The suit came on upon further consideration before WICKENS, V.-C., on July 12 and 14, 1871, when the learned Vice-Chancellor, without deciding as to the future rights of anyone to the accumulations, decided (L.R. 12 Eq. 559) that the charities were entitled to the whole of the surplus in equal shares, but that the accumulations, as directed by the will, must continue until further order. A petition was subsequently presented by the next of kin of the testator, asking whether they were entitled to the accumulations which had arisen since the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, and if so, whether they were entitled to require immediate payment thereof. It was decided by STIRLING, J. (and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and ultimately by the House of Lords), that the charities, not the next of kin, were entitled to the whole of the accumulations of income, and to have the accumulations stopped, and to be paid the surplus income of each year as it accrued. D

By an order made at chambers on June 9, 1894, upon the application of one of the charities, all the annuitants except one—Mrs. Venables, entitled to an annuity of £150—by their solicitors consenting to accept the provision made by the order for their respective annuities in full satisfaction thereof, and the charities by their solicitors also consenting, it was ordered that the funds in court should be dealt with as directed in the schedule to the order, but that when any of the annuities provided for in such schedules should fall in, regard was to be had in apportioning the entire funds on such accounts respectively not only to the directions contained in the order of July 12, 1871, as to apportionment, but also to the fact that the funds carried over by this order were wholly derived from pure personalty; and by the schedule certain funds were carried over to the account of the several annuitants. The charities then petitioned for the payment of the funds in court to them, other than the sums set apart to answer the annuities. Mrs. Venables alone opposed on the ground that the whole of the funds ought to remain in court during her life. In June, 1895, the petition came on to be heard before STIRLING, J., who ordered the E

A residue to be distributed subject to £8,000 being set aside to meet Mrs. Venables' annuity. Mrs. Venables appealed. The charities mentioned in the will were respondents to the appeal.

Dec. 16, 1895. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case there is an appeal, nominally in the name of Mrs. Venables, against an order made by STIRLING, J., directing certain funds to be paid over to some charities, which are residuary legatees. The direction for distribution is made although there is an annuity, charged upon the residuary estate, and still payable to Mrs. Venables. Under orders to which I need not refer, a sum of £8,000 in Consols has been set apart to answer Mrs. Venables' annuity. The amount of that annuity is £150 a year. In the judgment of STIRLING, J., that was an ample sum to be set apart to provide for the annuity, and the annuitant's counsel did not really contend the contrary. It is obvious upon consideration, having regard to the age of the lady and the amount of the annuity, that £8,000 is quite ample. But her counsel argued that STIRLING, J., had no jurisdiction to order the residuary estate to be divided, inasmuch as Mrs. Venables' annuity was charged upon the whole residuary estate. His point was that the annuity had not been paid and would not be paid until Mrs. Venables' death, and that on the terms of the will there was no jurisdiction in the court to order the residuary estate to be distributed until after her death. According to the strict language of the will, that, no doubt, is so.

What is the meaning of a will which charges a residuary estate with a legacy or several legacies, and then directs that upon the death of the annuitants the residue is to be divided? As between the annuitants, on the one hand, and the residuary legatees, on the other, it is a gift of the residue subject to the payment of the annuities, and if the annuities are released, or ample provision is made for the payment of those annuities, it has been the invariable practice of the court to let the residuary legatees have what is theirs. But the division is subject to an ample provision for the payment of the annuities. I confess that it took me by surprise to be told that there was no jurisdiction to make any such order as is asked for here, and that the court had never done it in face of opposition. That the court has been in the habit of doing it ever since LORD TALBOT'S time is obvious from the cases. Speaking from my own recollection—and my brother RIGBY confirms me—it has been done scores of times. But we are not prepared to say that we recollect a case where it was done in spite of opposition. Here the opposition is an opposition of a dog-in-the-manger kind, there being ample to provide for the annuity of Mrs. Venables. Counsel for one of the charities, the London Orphan Asylum, referred us to a great many authorities which supported that view of the practice of the court, and, in addition to those decisions which have been cited, there are one or two more. There is more particularly Fryer v. Buttar (1), which I will name without going through it. But there was considerable opposition there, although not actually to the distribution of the ultimate residue. The view taken by STIRLING, J., in the present case is the common-sense view, and it is, as I have already said, supported by the uniform practice of the court, and that is to let the residuary legatees have what is theirs, subject to setting aside a sufficient amount for the payment of the annuities. If in some unforeseen event it should become necessary for the annuitant to have recourse to the capital so set apart, she would be entitled to do so. But to suppose it is conceivable in any case, except the insolvency of the country, which is a contingency the court never contemplates, that she will not be paid her annuity in full is perfectly idle. A

So far there is no difficulty, and it was not because any of us felt a difficulty that we omitted to give judgment when the argument was concluded. But there was a question that occurred to us about the costs of this appeal which required care, and I will now say what I have to say about that point. The appeal will be dismissed with costs. But in these cases there is always a discretion in the Court of Appeal as to the orders it ought to make with reference to the question of costs, and I think the court is bound to see that its orders are not necessarily oppressive. It appears to me that in this case there was no sensible reason for all parties appearing by separate solicitors. It is well known that only two counsel on each side can be heard here. I think it would be oppressive to allow more than one set of costs. What I am prepared to do (and my colleagues agree with me) is to exercise our discretion on this occasion and give the costs to the party who has the conduct of the cause. There will be one set of costs to be paid by the annuitant and the others must pay their own costs. They are perfectly justified in employing their own solicitors if they like, but this is not a case where it was necessary for five sets of counsel to be instructed in order to protect the rights of the residuary legatees. B

It appeared to us that this appeal could not have been bona fide brought by, or in the interest of, Mrs. Venables, and we took upon ourselves the responsibility of communicating with the Official Solicitor and directing him to see Mrs. Venables to ascertain whether this appeal was brought by her, and in her interest, she understanding that there was amply sufficient in court to provide for her annuity. We have ascertained that this appeal is really the appeal of her solicitor, Mr. Hood-Barrs, in her name. The Official Solicitor has given us a letter purporting to be signed by Mr. Hood-Barrs, which is to this effect that it is his appeal, that he intends fighting this case to the House of Lords, and that he is to have the benefit of the appeal, if there is any benefit. Under those circumstances it does strike us that it is for him to show us why we should not make an order that he should pay the costs. C

RIGBY, L.J.—I also agree. E

Mr. Hood-Barrs addressed the court. F

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have now to consider whether this is a case in which an order ought to be made against Mrs. Venables' solicitor in person to indemnify his client against the costs of this appeal. We know now from Mr. Hood-Barrs' own statement the whole history of this case, and what this appeal is really for. It is now perfectly obvious that the suspicion which we had, when counsel first addressed us on the merits, is well founded—that this appeal cannot be fairly or properly regarded as an appeal brought in the interests of Mrs. Venables, but the object of the appeal is to compel the charities to come to some terms with Mr. Hood-Barrs, especially with respect to certain costs, as to some of which he has given his own personal guarantee. That explains his letter to Mrs. Venables which he admits is correct, and two passages of which I will read. He says : G

“With regard to the appeal about which I wrote you, as I have said, you will incur no liability whatever. Whatever liability there is will be with me. I hope ultimately to get a settlement of the appeal which will be beneficial to me”— H that is, I will take the burden of the appeal on myself and at the same time any benefit. That expresses in a few words the real truth of the matter. It is perfectly obvious to us that, although Mrs. Venables has so far authorised and approved of I

A this appeal as to render her responsible for the costs, yet, when we come to look at the matter as between her and her solicitor, it is equally obvious that she is a mere puppet in his hands, and that this appeal is brought by him for his own purposes and not in the interests of Mrs. Venables at all.

B Mr. Hood-Barrs has thought proper to cast aspersions on the conduct of the Official Solicitor. All that I can say is, that we are responsible for his going to Mrs. Venables. We were convinced—or, at all events, strongly of opinion—that this appeal was not an appeal brought by her in her interests—in other words, we did not believe that the real object of this appeal was its apparent object, namely, to get for her a better security for her annuity. It was quite obvious that it was our duty, having that opinion, to take care that a suitor of the court was not made liable for considerable costs for a purpose with which she had nothing whatever to do. I think that not only were we justified, but that we should have failed in our duty if having that view we did not investigate the matter by sending the Official Solicitor to inform us more about it. The Official Solicitor goes as the officer of the court; he is not a solicitor for the client—nothing of the sort. He has performed his duty in a way that at least has given us perfect satisfaction. We should be failing in our duty if we did not apply to this case the power which is to be found in R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11:

E “If in any case it shall appear to the court or a judge that costs have been improperly or without any reasonable cause incurred, or that by reason of any undue delay in proceeding under any judgment or order, or of any misconduct or default of the solicitor, any costs properly incurred have nevertheless proved fruitless to the person incurring the same, the court or judge may call on the solicitor of the person by whom such costs have been so incurred to show cause why such costs should not be disallowed as between the solicitor and his client, and also (if the circumstances of the case shall require) why the solicitor should not repay to his client any costs which the client may have been ordered to pay to any other person, . . . .”

F If there ever was a case in which that order ought to be applied, this is one. The charge against Mr. Hood-Barrs, which he has proved up to the hilt by his own statement, is, that this appeal is not brought for the benefit of his client, but that it is brought for the ulterior purpose of benefiting himself by compelling these charities, if he can, to come to some arrangement with him which they are not in the least bound to do, and which he has no right to impose. It is very nearly, if not quite, justifiable to say that it is a blackmailing appeal. As to the form of the order, the appeal will be dismissed with costs—one set of costs—to be paid by the annuitant, and to be repaid to her by Mr. Hood-Barrs personally. In other words, he is not to be entitled to any costs from his client. It must follow the terms of Ord. 65, r. 11.

H A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question which the court has now to determine is, whether it does appear to the court that “costs have been improperly or without any reasonable cause incurred” in this case. If the court comes to that opinion, power is given to the court, under Ord. 65, r. 11, to call upon the solicitor of the client to show cause why the costs should not be disallowed, or why he should not repay the costs which have been incurred by the client.

I The testator made a will, and controversy arose as to the construction of that will. My brother STIRLING put a construction upon it. This court afterwards put the same construction upon it, and the House of Lords has held that the construction put upon it by my brother STIRLING, and this court, was right. I do not for a moment say that that litigation, which as I understand was undertaken on behalf of the next of kin, who were the appellants in this court, and in the House of Lords, was not a proper litigation for Mr. Hood-Barrs to undertake. I do not say that in any shape or way up to the judgment in the House of Lords, which was given in March, 1895, any complaint can be made of Mr. Hood-Barrs in the matter. None whatever. What we have to determine is, as to what took place after March, 1895, when the decision of the House of Lords was given. The decision of the House of Lords affirmed that certain charities, five in number, were entitled to the corpus of the property subject to certain annuities. The House of Lords gave judgment for the respondents with costs against the appellants there, who were Mr. Hood-Barrs' clients. It seems to me that Mr. Hood-Barrs after that judgment had been given against his clients did all he could to get those charities to forgo their costs. That seems to me to be all right. But he could not get them to agree to that, and they were within their rights in saying they would not do so.

Then what happened? The charities want to get the property to which the House of Lords said they were entitled. That property was invested at that time in consols in court in the administration of the testator's estate. The charities took out a summons before my brother STIRLING to get an order that the corpus should be paid out to them in the shares to which they had been adjudged entitled under the decision of the House of Lords, but, of course, subject to such part of the corpus being set aside as would fully secure the annuitants having a charge upon the corpus. STIRLING, J., took into consideration the circumstances as regarded Mrs. Venables, and no doubt as regarded the other annuitants—none of whom appeal against his order—and he said: "If I set apart £8,000, and keep that in court for the purpose of satisfying your annuity I am perfectly certain you will have your annuity of £150 a year as long as you live." I am perfectly satisfied that STIRLING, J., was right in that. Nobody can hear what I am saying without being satisfied that the order of my brother STIRLING was a just order to make as between the annuitants, on the one part, and the charities, on the other, who were entitled to the residue of the corpus.

But now comes the difficulty with regard to Mr. Hood-Barrs. Mr. Hood-Barrs could not get the charities to agree to forgo the costs; so he goes to Mrs. Venables, who is a lady certainly not in affluent circumstances, and he gets her name for the purpose of appealing against that order of STIRLING, J. It certainly did appear to me, when counsel was arguing this case on behalf of the annuitant, that it was a senseless appeal, and one which nobody could have brought unless he or she had been ill advised, or was perverse or obstinate. I came to the conclusion that this was not in substance Mrs. Venables' appeal. It struck me—and I use a word which I have used before today, as no other word will properly describe it—as cruel, in such an appeal as this, which we had to dismiss, that we should make this unfortunate annuitant pay the costs. She has only a small annuity of £150 a year, and the costs in this court could not be otherwise than heavy when the appeal was dismissed. We have an officer of this court who is called the Official Solicitor. In my judgment, the Official Solicitor is appointed in order that a judge may communicate with him when he sees before him matters which he wants investigated, as regards the absolute accuracy of which counsel is not instructed, and has no knowledge whatever. It is then the duty of the judge to communicate with the Official Solicitor in order that the judge may be informed where the real truth of the case lies. In this case, Mr. Hood-Barrs chooses to apply the term "dirty work" to what the Official Solicitor has done. But I say—and I say it emphatically—that that term ought not to be applied, because the Official Solicitor has faithfully carried out our orders, which orders, considering the position in which we were placed, we were bound to give.

So we find out it was not Mrs. Venables' appeal. It is all very well to say that she had given instructions to Mr. Hood-Barrs, but what interest has Mrs. Venables in appealing to this court? She had her £8,000 capital set apart for her for the rest of her life, which sum was more than sufficient to pay, whatever might happen, her annuity of £150 a year. Mr. Hood-Barrs comes and tells us—and I have no doubt accurately—the attempts he had made to settle after he was defeated in the House of Lords. He could not get a settlement, and, as has been pointed out by my brother LINDLEY, this appeal is not brought in the interests of Mrs. Venables at all.

A It was perfectly immaterial to her, except as regards costs, which way it went; but it was brought for the purpose of coercing, if Mr. Hood-Barrs could, these charities to come to his terms. In the letter of Nov. 9, 1895, he says, "I hope ultimately to get a settlement of the appeal which will be a benefit to me." If there ever was a case in which r. 11 of Ord. 65 should be put into force it appears to me to be this, and I think that the order which my brother LINDLEY has mentioned ought to be made.

C RIGBY, L.J. I will assume for the purposes of my judgment in this case that the conduct of Mr. Hood-Barrs, down to the time when the order was made by STIRLING, J., for setting aside a sum to provide for Mrs. Venables' annuity, was not only justifiable, but from the point of view of his client altogether beneficial to the client, and that in every respect, down to that period, he was free from blame. The order made was that £8,000 2½ per cent. annuities should be appropriated to meet an annuity of £150 a year payable to a widow during the term of her life. It was not mentioned in the order that in the improbable—one might almost say the impossible —event of the annuity ever being larger than the income produced by that £8,000 the annuitant could have recourse to the £8,000 capital. But at any rate it was shown in argument addressed to us that the charities offered to have that made clear upon the face of the order; and that that offer, for reasons which we now perfectly comprehend, was declined. I say this because from Mr. Hood-Barrs' own statement it becomes abundantly clear that he did not think that the £8,000 was an insufficient security. He tells us himself, apparently unconscious of the conclusion that would be drawn from what he said, that he was willing after the order was made to come to terms which would release £2,000 out of the £8,000, leaving £6,000 only. He stipulated that his client, Mrs. Venables, should be allowed to resort to the capital of the remaining £6,000—terms less advantageous to his client than those which I believe were effectuated by the order. Those terms, at any rate, which fact for this purpose is more important, were offered by the other side at that time and declined.
F So that I think it would be absurd to suppose that Mr. Hood-Barrs imagined that Mrs. Venables' interests were in any way concerned in this appeal.

G But we have it now made clear, and I must say that it appeared to me not improbable, that Mr. Hood-Barrs had a direct personal interest in the matter, or, at any rate, had grounds for believing that, if he could get this order, which his client's interests in no way required him to get, reversed on this appeal his own pocket would be the better for it, because he could impose terms upon the charities which would relieve him from the personal undertaking he had entered into to pay certain costs which I need not specifically refer to. That being the position of things, and that being, as we have from Mr. Hood-Barrs' own lips, his own appreciation of the case—namely, that Mrs. Venables was sufficiently secured, and that she had no interest in the appeal—he approaches her. He suggests—and a more improper H suggestion I venture to say was never made—that she should lend her name to him coming here to this court as though she were the bona fide appellant, on the terms that he should indemnify her against costs, and that he personally should take the benefit of the appeal. It startles one to find that a solicitor, an officer of this court, can come into court and openly avow a transaction of that kind, and yet apparently I remain unconscious of the absolute impropriety of it. It appears to me that that unconsciousness, if it be not assumed, is a very grave feature of the case.

Mr. Hood-Barrs permitted himself to make observations from a high standpoint as that of a respectable solicitor who had a right to throw aspersions on others who were doing their duty. I wish it to be known that, in my judgment at any rate, it is not the part of a respectable solicitor to induce clients to lend their names for appeals, in which they have no interest at all, in order that the solicitor himself may gain his own private ends. I look upon such an agreement as an abuse of the practice of the court. Mr. Hood-Barrs thought it right to complain of the fact that he was not approached for information. I have formed my own judgment as to the sort of information we should have got from him if he had been allowed to be the go-between between the court and Mrs. Venables. I feel satisfied that we should not have arrived at the true state of things; and I am certain that we should have been altogether disregarding our duty if, in a case of this kind, we had not instructed the Official Solicitor to find out the facts which otherwise I feel convinced we never should have known. I will only say that I think that the Official Solicitor in doing what he did in no way exceeded the instructions that were given to him by us, and that he did what was perfectly right and proper. I protest against the notion that this court is to be bound by any idea of etiquette or by any theories as to what is respectable between solicitors, and to shut the door to information which would never have been obtained if we had not taken the course that we did. I consider that, if ever there was a case of costs being occasioned improperly, this is that case. I concur in the judgment which LINDLEY, L.J., has mentioned, that this is a case in which Mr. Hood-Barrs can recover nothing from his client, and that he must repay to her any costs which she is liable to pay under the order of the court already made. The fact that he indemnified her is one of the charges against him. It is no merit that he did it. It was absolutely wrong to do it. After this I hope no solicitor will ever come and say: "I intended what was right, I used the process of the court to bring about what I thought right, and I did it by deceiving the court in the first instance into a belief that it was not I acting in my own interest, but an innocent client who was bringing an appeal which the court has decided to be not only wrong, but altogether without precedent."

SAVOY OVERSEERS v. ART UNION OF LONDON

Rates—Exemption—Society instituted for purposes of fine arts—"Voluntary contributions"—Advantages received by members—Scientific Societies Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 36) s. 1.

By the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, s. 1, owners of land or buildings are exempted from being rated if the hereditament belongs to a society "instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively . . . and occupied by it for the transaction of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes, provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions," and shall make no dividend or bonus in money to its members.

A society which was instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively gave each member in return for his subscription of a guinea a copy of an engraving and a chance in an annual distribution of prizes, both of which might result in substantial pecuniary benefit to the member.

Held: on their true construction the words "voluntary contributions" in s. 1 of the Act must be taken to mean contributions which were given without any advantage being received in return; on the facts it appeared that each member of the society obtained an ample return for the money which he had subscribed; and, therefore, the society was not exempted from being rated.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported [1894] 2 Q.B. 609, reversing by a majority a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (WRIGHT and HENN COLLINS, JJ.), by which the latter court held that the Art Union Society was rateable in respect of their buildings, as not being an institution exclusively devoted to the purposes of encouraging literature, science, and the fine arts, supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary subscriptions, within the meaning of the Act. In the Court of Appeal LORD ESHER, M.R., and KAY, L.J., held that the society was exempt because, in their opinion, it did exist for the purposes mentioned exclusively, and that the contributions of its members were voluntary. A. L. SMITH, L.J., who dissented, held that, while the society existed for the purposes mentioned, the contributions were not voluntary, because the object of the subscribers was to obtain advantages for themselves. The overseers appealed.

The facts appear in the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Haldinstein for the overseers.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Bristowe for the society.

The House took time for consideration.

May 5, 1896. The following opinions were read,

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The appellants are the overseers of the poor and chapelwarden of the Royal Precinct of the Savoy, within which precinct the Art Union of London have premises which are rateable, unless they are exempted from such rating by virtue of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, s. 1, which is as follows :

“ . . . from and after October 1, 1843, no person or persons shall be assessed or rated, or liable to be assessed or rated, or liable to pay, to any county, borough, parochial, or other local rates or cesses, in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses or buildings, belonging to any society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively, either as tenant or as owner, and occupied by it for the transaction of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes, provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions, and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members, and provided also that such society shall obtain the certificate of the barrister-at-law or Lord Advocate, as hereinafter mentioned.”

The question in this case depends upon a very simple alternative exposition of the sense in which the legislature used the words “voluntary.” The society is partly supported by annual contributions, and the word “voluntary” must be construed in order to decide whether it is partly supported by voluntary contributions.

Two conditions have been insisted on for the exemption claimed by the Art Union. One is the exclusive devotion of its property to the purposes of art, and upon that, as it appears to me, no question arises. But the other condition is that it must be wholly or in part supported by voluntary contributions. There is no doubt that the word "voluntary" is constantly used in two different senses. It is constantly used as the antithesis of something done under compulsion; but it is also used commonly among lawyers, and not uncommonly among other people, as denoting the obtaining or giving of something without anything being obtained in return. A lawyer speaks of a voluntary conveyance as opposed to one which involves valuable consideration. It is common to hear of some institution supported by voluntary contributions. There is no doubt of the frequent use of the word "voluntary" in both these senses, and the problem to be solved is in what sense, or in which of these two senses, the legislature has used the word in the section under consideration. It is manifest that, if used in the former sense, every purchase is voluntary since no one can be compelled to buy; but if in the latter sense, there are a great many institutions which the legislature may well have intended to encourage, because, if people gave their money without receiving anything in return towards the encouragement of objects which the legislature approved, there would be a reason why the legislature should exempt such institutions from rating, since they would pro tanto relieve the national funds from burdens which but for such voluntary contributions the legislature might itself be called upon to contribute, if such institutions were to exist at all.

This consideration would seem to show that it is in the latter sense that the word is used, and, if so, it is fatal to the claim of the Art Union to be relieved from the burden in question. It hardly admits of debate that the Art Union gives to every subscriber full value for his money; the document published by the Art Union itself appears to establish very clearly that the subscriber obtains as an equivalent for his contribution money's worth at least equal to, if not beyond, the amount he has subscribed. I cannot, therefore, regard this as a voluntary contribution; it is a prudent and well-rewarded investment. The result is that the exemption cannot be insisted on, and I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed and the appeal allowed with costs.

LORD HERSCHELL.--The question raised by this appeal is whether the respondent society is exempt from liability to be rated in respect of a building occupied by it, on the ground that it belongs to a society instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively and is occupied by it for carrying into effect its purposes, and that the society is supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions. The Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench held that the respondents were not so exempt, but this judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, A. L. SMITH, L.J., dissenting.

It is stated by the charter that the respondent society was formed

"for the general advancement of the fine arts, and for promoting and facilitating a greater knowledge and love of the arts of design on the part of the public generally."

Whatever view may be taken of the means employed to accomplish this end, I see no reason to doubt that the society was instituted for the purposes of the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the statute, and that these purposes have not been departed from. Upon this point the Court of Appeal was unanimous. The question which gave rise to a difference of opinion is one of great difficulty. Is the society supported wholly or in part "by annual voluntary contributions"? These words have been the subject of much discussion, and there are many judicial dicta bearing upon their meaning. I proceed at once to an examination of the authorities, for if these had been uniform and consistent your Lordships would have been unwilling, though not bound by them, to disturb a long-settled construction of the statute. But it will be seen that this is very far from being the case.

The earliest of the authorities is Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw (1). LORD DENMAN, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said (10 Q.B. at pp. 875, 876):

"It is perhaps not easy to determine what the legislature intended by the word 'voluntary' in this combination. . . . Upon consideration we think that annual contributions will satisfy the condition required if they commence of the party's own choice, are so continued, and may be withdrawn at pleasure. . . . If the contributor was free to commence his contribution and incurs no legal obligation to continue it when he has once commenced, and upon ceasing to contribute will lose no more than the privileges of membership in respect of which he became a contributor, it seems to us that he must be considered a voluntary contributor, unless we add something to the idea of voluntariness which in ordinary language it does not import. And that is what, in fact, is done by those who contend that it must also be gratuitous and bring no return of any kind to the contributor."

This judgment appears to me to lose sight of the fact that what has to be construed is the combination "voluntary contributions," and not merely the word "voluntary" alone, or in some other combination. It may be that this word is ordinarily used as the antithesis to "compulsory," though in legal parlance it is quite commonly employed to describe that which is gratuitous and without consideration. But putting aside this legal acceptation of the word, I cannot think that "voluntary contributions" in the statute means the same thing as "voluntary payments," or that an institution can properly be said to be supported by voluntary contributions where these are the price paid for a purchase, whether of goods or advantages, merely because the person making the payment was under no obligation to do so.

The Birmingham Case (1) was followed in R. v. Manchester Overseers (2), the Royal Manchester Institution being held exempt from rating. In R. v. Brandt (3), however, where it was sought to extend the exemption to a concert-hall, to the concerts in which subscribers and their friends alone were admitted, LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., said (16 Q.B. at p. 471):

"We look upon this institution as totally different from the Birmingham Library or the Manchester Institution, where the members, not with a view to their own gratification but to the good of others, by cultivating in them a taste for literature, science, and the fine arts, subscribe money and contribute their personal trouble, and may therefore be fairly supposed to be the objects of the special favour of the legislature at the cost of their fellow parishioners."

Again, in R. v. Gaskell (4), a house belonging to the Portico Society, containing a library and reading room, the use of which was confined to members of the society, was on the same grounds held not exempt. The question next arose in R. v. Governors of Russell Institution (5). It was held not to be a society instituted for purposes of literature exclusively, but LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., made some observations on the part of the enactment now under consideration. He said (3 E. & B. at pp. 427, 428):

"It is unnecessary to decide whether this be a society supported in part by annual voluntary contributions within the meaning of the Act. There may be ground for contending that 'contribution' here does not mean a voluntary annual subscription or payment of money for value received, or expected to be received, by the party paying, but means a gift from disinterested motives for the benefit of others."

In Churchwardens of St. Anne's v. Linnean Society (6) a building belonging to that society was held to be without the exemption. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., said (3 E. & B. at pp. 804, 805):

"The case in no way resembles the Russell Institution, where newspapers were supplied and accommodations given to the subscribers, preventing the payments from being mere voluntary contributions for the promotion of science."

A It is to be noted, too, that the mere fact that the payments of the Fellows were voluntary in the sense that they might be discontinued at any time was apparently treated as unimportant, for the Chief Justice, after pointing out that, though the Fellows were under an obligation to pay while they continued Fellows, the payment was still voluntary, seeing that the obligation was incurred by a voluntary engagement from which the Fellows were at liberty to withdraw, added (ibid. at p. 804):

C While the building belonging to the Linnean Society obtained the benefit of the exemption, it was held inapplicable to the buildings of the Zoological Society: St. Marglebone Vestry v. Zoological Society (7). The decision turned mainly upon the earlier provisions of the enactment; but LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., observed that, if it had been necessary to decide the point, he should have said that the contributions were not voluntary contributions within the meaning of the Act, inasmuch as subscribers looked to the amusement which they and their families and friends would derive from their access to the gardens. And on the same point D ERLE, J., said (3 E. & B. at p. 822):

“As to the question whether the contributions are voluntary, we have expressed an opinion that contributions are not so where the intention is to purchase a private convenience, as is the case, I believe, with many institutions which also embrace scientific objects.”

E In the case of the Bradford Library, which was open only to members (Bradford Library Society v. Churchwardens of Bradford (8)) the Queen’s Bench followed the Birmingham Case (1). ERLE, J., said (28 L.J.M.C. at pp. 77, 78):

F “Although personal benefit is derived by each subscriber, that is not a personal benefit or convenience such as has been mentioned in some of the cases, which means something in the nature of that derived from an investment of money, though not absolutely a return of so much per cent.; if you by investment, get something for which you would otherwise have to pay—for instance, the advantage of nonpayment on admission to public gardens—then the subscription is not voluntary.”

G This does not seem to me quite consistent with the dictum of the same learned judge which I have just quoted. Each member of the library did purchase a private convenience. He obtained the opportunity of reading books which he must otherwise have purchased or hired. This seems to me to be a return for the investment he made in contributing to the funds of the library. I confess that I am unable to appreciate the distinction which the learned judge suggests.

H Somewhat similar words came before the courts for construction in the case of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, which exempted from the taxation thereby imposed “property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed.” The view taken of the meaning of the words “voluntarily contributed” in Re Duty on Estate of New University Club (9), and by my noble friends LORDS WATSON and MACNAGHTEN, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest (10), was in complete accordance I with that more than once expressed by LORD CAMPBELL in discussing the meaning of the expression “voluntary contributions.”

The matter now comes for the first time before your Lordships’ House for decision. I do not think that it was intended to exempt from rating buildings belonging to a society merely because the payments by which it was wholly or in part supported were made voluntarily and not compulsorily, when they were not made gratuitously, but were the price of advantages obtained in return for them. The expression “supported by voluntary contributions” has long been well known in connection with hospitals and other institutions. I think that the essential idea conveyed by them is that the payments are a gratuitous offering for the benefit of others, and not the price of an advantage purchased by the contributor. It was pointed out by KAY, L.J., that in the case of some hospitals the contributors receive a certain number of letters of admission measured by the amount of their subscriptions. But though this may give them a voice as to the persons who are to be the objects of the charity, I think that it would be unreasonable to regard the contribution as being on that account not a gratuitous charitable gift, but the purchase of a personal advantage. If, indeed, a hospital were established on co-operative principles, each contributor being entitled to claim medical treatment there, and the inmates being confined to contributors, I should say that it was not supported by "voluntary contributions," even though there was nothing to compel any person to become a contributor, and he might cease to be so at any time he pleased.

Applying the construction which I have put upon the statute to the facts of the present case, I have come to the conclusion that the payments made by the members of the Art Union are not "voluntary contributions." Every member receives each year, in return for his subscription of a guinea, a copy of an engraving, and, in addition, one chance in the annual distribution of prizes. He may purchase extra chances at half-a-guinea each. The council also present a consolation prize to members who have paid ten consecutive subscriptions without gaining any prize. This arrangement, they say, "has given great satisfaction, and has avoided any disappointment on account of want of success in the annual distribution." And they point out that the engraving given to every one is a work of the market value at least of his subscription, and that, looking to the probable extinction of line-engraving, members have the opportunity of acquiring invaluable artists' proofs, the value of which in a few years must rise to many times their present cost. In addition to this, attention is called by the council to the fact that the highest prize of one year, £300, with £200 added by the prizewinner, was expended on the purchase of a picture which had since been sold for upwards of £1,000. When statements such as these are put forward by the council as an inducement to persons to join the society, I cannot but hold that the contributions of the members are not "voluntary contributions" within the meaning of the Act. I think, therefore, that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—It cannot, I think, be denied that the Art Union of London is a society instituted for the purposes of the fine arts exclusively. That seems to me to be clear on consideration of its charter and byelaws, and the provisions of the Art Unions Act, 1846. But it seems to me to be equally clear that the Art Union of London cannot properly be described as a society "supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions." This description, which is an essential condition of immunity under the Act, has given rise to a good deal of controversy and some difference of opinion. Apart from authority the meaning of the provision would seem to be tolerably obvious. The observation that must, I think, occur to anyone who may be called upon to construe it, is that the phrase which the legislature has adopted is an old and familiar acquaintance. In the public streets it meets the eye not infrequently on the walls of hospitals; it is to be found in the forefront of many charitable appeals. So used it carries with it a meaning which nobody can mistake. It means that the institution on whose behalf the statement is put forward depends for its support on freewill offerings, on the generosity of persons acting from disinterested motives, and not looking for any returns in the shape of direct personal advantage. Except in the Act of 1843 the expression is not, I think, found in any other connection. Nor is it, so far as I am aware, ever used in any other sense outside the Act. It is only natural to suppose that the enactment points to contributions partaking of a similar character, and made in a similar spirit. It appears to me to be almost absurd to say that a society is supported by voluntary contributions when it prides itself, as

A the Art Union of London apparently does, on returning to every contributor the equivalent of his contributions in market value and money's worth.

Very little assistance is to be derived from the reported cases on the subject. The authorities are, I think, neither clear nor uniform. The error, if I may call it so, began in 1849: Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw (1). There LORD DENMAN, C.J., who delivered the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, observes (10 Q.B. at p. 875); that

Then his Lordship proceeds to take the word out of its setting, and to deal with it as if it stood alone. On this the difficulty vanishes, and the conclusion is that, if the contributor was free to commence his contribution, and incurs no legal obligation to continue it, he must be considered a voluntary contributor, “unless” as his Lordship says (ibid. at pp. 875, 876), “we add something to the idea of voluntariness which in ordinary language it does not import.” LORD DENMAN's view was carried still further in a later case, Bradford Library Society v. Churchwardens of Bradford (8), per LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., citing Churchwardens of St. Anne v. Linnean Society (6), where it was laid down that “a contribution paid under an obligation voluntarily incurred is a voluntary contribution.” So that it seems that it would not be inappropriate to describe a co-operative store, where membership is constituted by the purchase of an annual ticket, or even the ground landlord of a fashionable quarter of London, as supported in part by annual voluntary contributions.

On the other hand, in order to escape from the consequence of this view, which would render the condition under consideration almost, if not altogether, unmeaning, it has been held in several cases that, where a contributor derives personal advantage from being a member of a society, the society, though formed for one of the purposes favoured by the Act, cannot be considered as formed for that purpose “exclusively.” This mode of construction may be admissible when the society is not incorporated, and its purpose, consequently, is not defined by charter or statute. When, however, that is the case, it seems to confuse the purpose of the society with the object of its individual members in joining it. In some cases it has been said that contributions which go to purchase some private benefit in the shape of amusement or convenience are not to be deemed voluntary according to the true intention of the Act. I do not think that it is so; but then I think that this intention is only to be discovered by taking the words as they occur, in the combination in which they are placed, not by breaking up a compound expression, and weighing the words separately. I agree with the view that A. L. SMITH, L.J., has expressed, and I think that the appeal must be allowed.

H LORD SHAND.—In the decision of this case I think that a distinction must be clearly drawn between the purpose for which the society was instituted and the object of those who join it and annually subscribe to its funds. The society was, I think, instituted for the promotion of the fine arts exclusively. The question whether it has been supported wholly or in part by voluntary contributions involves a consideration of the purpose and object which the persons who give the annual contributions have in view in becoming contributors. It seems to be quite clear that the inducement held out to contributors to join the society, which, therefore, may be taken to show the object for which the contributors become members, is that they will receive a return, not in money it is true, but in money's worth, which appears to me to be the same thing, for every contribution made. The members become in truth purchasers of personal property in the form of engravings, with the addition of the chance of prizes in the shape of paintings, advantages which form an adequate return for the money subscribed. I agree with your Lordships in thinking that money subscribed in this way cannot properly be regarded as “voluntary contributions.” That term seems to me to imply not merely that the subscriber chooses of his own free will to make his contribution, but that he does so for the benefit of others, as in the support of a hospital or other charitable institution, or in the promotion of science, literature, or the fine arts. It is not, I think, properly applicable to what is in substance a business transaction or investment in which the stipulation, or at least the agreement, is that a personal advantage substantially of the value of the sum subscribed is to be received in return by the contributor. I, therefore, concur in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

MEUX v. GREAT EASTERN RAIL. CO.

Carriage of Goods—Railway—Passenger's luggage—Damage—Passenger an employee taking employer's property on journey—Damage to property through active negligence of railway servant—Right of employer to sue railway company for tort.

A servant brought to the station of the defendant railway company as his personal luggage a box containing liveries, the property of his employer, which had been provided for his (the servant's) use, and took a ticket for himself to enable him to travel by the same train as was carrying the box. By an act which amounted to active negligence on the part of a servant of the company and was not merely nonfeasance the liveries were damaged.

Held: although there existed no contract between the employer and the company on which the employer could sue for the damage to his property, the employer could recover in respect of that damage in an action for tort, that right not being affected by the contract to carry the property between the servant and the company.

F Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of MATHEW, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff, Lady Meux, brought the action against the defendant railway company to recover damages for damage done to certain liveries belonging to the plaintiff, which, she alleged, was caused by the negligent acts of the defendants' servant of the railway company took possession, and dealt with in this way, of the plaintiff; that they were handed in to the custody of the defendants' servants by F. Harrer, C. Slade, and J. Wilson, three servants of the plaintiff, or by one of them, at Waltham Cross station, on June 5, 1894, to be carried by the defendants by the 3.40 p.m. train to Liverpool Street station as passengers' luggage; that the property was overturned in front of the train, and was damaged and became useless to the plaintiff; and that F. Harrer, C. Slade, and J. Wilson were passengers by the 3.40 p.m. train from Waltham Cross to Liverpool Street, on June 5, 1894, and were travelling as the servants and upon the request of and at the expense of the plaintiff. The liveries were provided for the use of these servants of the plaintiff. MATHEW, J., gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

J. Alderson Foote for the plaintiff.

Jelf, Q.C., and F. H. Collier for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff has brought an action against the railway company upon the ground that her property was in a portmanteau, of which a servant of the railway company took possession, and dealt with it in this way. He took it in order to put it into the train, and was carrying it along the station for that purpose, but he carried it badly and so carelessly that it fell from the platform on to the line, and was damaged. It seems to me that that was an active act on the part of the servant, and not a mere nonfeasance. A

It is suggested that there is no evidence of negligence. What happened in this case was unusual, and, in the absence of explanation, that is evidence to show that there was negligence. We ought to assume, therefore, that the act was done negligently. The plaintiff says that, therefore, she has a right to sue. The answer of the railway company is, that the portmanteau was brought by a servant of the plaintiff, who took a ticket for himself to travel, and gave the portmanteau to a porter as his personal luggage, to be carried as personal luggage; that there was, therefore, a contract to carry it as personal luggage made by the company with the plaintiff's servant alone, and with him personally and not on behalf of the plaintiff, who, therefore, was not a party to the contract; and that, if there was a breach of that contract, the plaintiff cannot sue. I think that that is quite true, because the portmanteau was taken as personal luggage, and accepted as personal luggage, and the contract with regard to it was made only with the plaintiff's servant personally. If the portmanteau had not been taken as personal luggage, but as other luggage, then the servant would have made a contract for its carriage on behalf of his mistress. This is often the case when a servant is sent in advance with a load of his master's luggage. If that luggage is paid for, and is not taken as personal luggage, the servant makes a contract for his master, and, if there is any breach of that contract, the master may sue in respect of it. But if the servant takes his master's luggage as if it were his own personal luggage, there is a contract with him alone, and he does not make any contract on behalf of his master, and the master cannot sue in respect of anything when the right to sue depends upon that contract. If, therefore, there is an omission to carry with sufficient care, or to deliver such luggage, amounting to a breach of the contract, the master cannot sue in respect of such breach. B

Does the fact that the plaintiff cannot sue upon the contract deprive her of a right which she would have had if there had been no contract at all? I think not. The existence of a contract between the railway and another person, the servant, cannot deprive the master of a right which he would otherwise have. When, therefore, is a person entitled to sue for such an act as was committed here, when no contract has been made with him? Is there not such a right existing in a person whose property is given into the possession of another person that, if that other person damages the property, it must be wrongful? And is there anything in the existence of a contract to deprive him of that right? If luggage is taken to a train without the knowledge of the railway company, surreptitiously, the company is not liable for injury to it if the company does not know it is there. If it is placed openly on the company's premises to be carried, the company knows it is there and allows it to be there, and it must be a wrongful act on the part of the company to do any negligent or wrongful act to it, as, for instance, to throw it out. If the company takes up such luggage and carries it, the company must do so with reasonable care. Under such circumstances, the company is liable if there is no contract, or a contract made with someone other than the owner, if they negligently injure the luggage. F
H

What authority is there to the contrary? I entirely agree with the judgment of BRAMWELL, L.J., in Hayn v. Culliford (1), where he says (4 C.P.D. at p. 185): I

"If then there is a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the defendants are liable. So also if there is not. For, if so, the case is this: The goods were lawfully with the defendants' licence in their ship, and they tortiously so dealt with them that the goods were injured. It was found as a fact that the loading of the oxide was negligent. It was, therefore, wrongful, not as a breach of contract, but as a wrongful act in itself. If the defendants had done what was done wilfully, that is to say, intentionally, that it would

A injure the plaintiff's goods, it is clear they would be liable. But what difference does it make that they did it ignorantly? It may be asked where is the duty of care? I answer, that duty exists in all men not to injure the property of others. This is not a mere nonfeasance which is complained of, it is a misfeasance, an act and wrongful."

B He uses the word "lawfully" to contrast it with the word "tortiously," but the proposition would have been equally good without it, for the goods were there with the defendants' licence.

That is a sound doctrine, and seems to me to be stated also in Foulkes v. Metropolitan District Rail. Co. (2) by BRAMWELL, L.J., who there says (5 C.P.D. at pp. 158, 159):

C "But, further, though the contract were with the South Western, the plaintiff is entitled to recover against these defendants. In that case there would be no duty of contract, and, consequently, no cause of action for a nonfeasance. But there would be that duty which the law imposes on all, namely, to do no act to injure another."

D There, again, the distinction is drawn between an omission and a wrongful act or misfeasance. In both cases it is said that the right of the person injured is independent of contract, and arises from a breach of the duty imposed by the fact of dealing actively with the property. If the railway company so deals with the property as to injure it they are liable. Those are authorities for the proposition which I have stated, and principle goes with those authorities.

E As to Alton v. Midland Rail. Co. (3), I think that that case does not touch this matter at all: it was decided on different facts, and, therefore, decides only the point which was raised and argued. I think that it does not contradict what I have said as to the right of action in such a case as this. This right is not dependent upon contract, and is not taken away by the contract made with the servant. I am of opinion that the judgment of MATHEW, J., was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

F KAY, L.J.— This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for injury done to her property by the Great Eastern Rail. Co. That property consisted of liveries belonging to her, and then in the possession of her servant, who was about to be a passenger in a train on the defendants' railway. It seems that the servant took these liveries as his own personal luggage. Undoubtedly these liveries were the property of the plaintiff. The liveries were damaged, and the plaintiff sues in respect of her property in the liveries. The damage was done through a servant of the defendants negligently dropping the portmanteau, which contained them, on to the railway line. That was an act of the defendants' servant, an act of commission, and an active interference with the luggage which was negligent and improper. There is no doubt here that the act complained of was not merely an act of omission or nonperformance, but was one of active commission.

H The law applicable to such facts is all summed up in Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (4). That was an action for personal injuries, and the general doctrine is thus stated in that case by LINDLEY, L.J. ([1895] 1 Q.B. at pp. 138, 139):

I "It appears to me that this is an action founded on tort, and the conclusion to which I have arrived is based upon the following reasons. That which caused the injury was not an act of omission, it was not a mere nonfeasance; it was not merely the not taking such care of the plaintiff as by the contract the defendants were bound to take, but it was an act of misfeasance—it was positive negligence in jamming his hand. Contract or no contract, he could maintain an action for that. All that the plaintiff would have to prove in such a case would be that he was lawfully on the premises of the railway company, and the contract is merely a part of the history of the case."

A. L. SMITH, L.J., said (ibid. at pp. 139, 140) :

"It is not disputed that, as a matter of pleading, a plaintiff, for a cause of action such as the present, may declare in either contract or tort, but this is not the governing consideration. It is clear that a person lawfully upon railway premises may maintain an action against a railway company for injuries sustained while there by reason of the active negligence of the company's servants, whether he has a contract with the company or not . . . and he need not allege or prove any contract at all; he need only allege and prove that he was lawfully where he was, and was then injured by the active negligence of the company's servants, for this is sufficient to show a breach of that duty on the part of the defendants which is implied by law."

The question there was whether the action was one of tort, upon a question of costs, and it was treated as an action of tort, entirely independent of contract; that is, as an action for damages for an active tort.

Here these goods were lawfully on the premises of the defendant company. The portmanteau was accepted as the personal luggage of the servant to be carried as such. It is impossible, therefore, to say that it was not lawfully upon the premises. The railway company could not have refused to carry it as passenger's luggage. This case is different from a case where the luggage belongs entirely to someone other than the passenger. The servant of the plaintiff was a bailee of the goods, and the luggage was consequently lawfully upon the defendants' premises. I express no opinion upon the question whether, if the goods were not the goods of the servant at all, but belonged entirely to someone else, they would be lawfully upon the defendants' premises. Whether the railway company could, under such circumstances, after accepting them as passenger's luggage, damage them and then say that they were not passenger's luggage, I need not say. There are indeed some authorities that they would not be liable. These goods were lawfully upon the premises, and were injured by a negligent act, and the authorities are clear that the owner is entitled to sue in respect of that tort, because the railway company owed a duty to the owner not to damage the goods by any act. MATHEW, J., therefore, came to a wrong conclusion upon the facts of this case, and the appeal must succeed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J. I am of opinion that the judgment of MATHEW, J., cannot be supported. He held that the plaintiff was not entitled to bring the action. The facts of the case are short and simple. The liveries were the property of the plaintiff, and were brought by her servant to the defendants' station as personal luggage belonging to him. The liveries were to be worn by him. By the active negligence of the defendants' servants those liveries were damaged; it was not a case of mere nonfeasance. I am not going to decide whether the plaintiff's servant could recover damages, because of Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Co. (5), which may some day require further consideration. If the servant could have sued, he could have sued either upon contract or for a tort wholly independent of contract.

Then arises the question, whether the plaintiff can sue. She has suffered damage because her property was destroyed while lawfully upon the premises of the defendant company. It is said that she cannot sue because there was no contract between her and the defendants. I agree that she cannot sue upon contract; but I say that she has an action of tort wholly independent of any contract, her goods having been lawfully upon the defendants' premises, and there damaged by the negligent act of commission of the defendants' servant. The answer given to that is, that she cannot sue because there was a contract between her servant and the defendants. In my opinion, Alton v. Midland Rail. Co. (3) did not decide anything to the contrary of what I have stated to be the law. I tried, in Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (4), to explain that case. In Alton v. Midland

A Rail. Co. (3) the plea was that the plaintiff was not a party to the contract. There was a demurrer to that plea. The sole point was whether the master could take advantage of the contract made with his servant, and recover damages from the railway company. In my opinion, that case is no authority for the proposition that the plaintiff cannot sue irrespective of any contract. Hayn v. Culliford (1), Marshall v. York, Berwick, and Newcastle Rail. Co. (6), Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (4), and Kelly v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (7), are all authorities in favour of the right to sue. It is impossible, therefore, to say that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and this appeal must be allowed.

G A limited company is not prohibited from paying dividends because its paid-up capital is not intact. If a heavy, unexpected loss is sustained, it may be necessary to apply capital to meet it, and the payment of all future dividends until the capital so expended is made good is not forbidden. If, however, expenses or payments are improperly charged to capital simply to swell the apparent profits and make it appear that dividends may be properly declared, the dividends paid in such circumstances cannot be treated as legitimately paid out of profits and can no more be justified than if they were paid out of capital.

H Observations on these matters by the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD DAVEY (post pp. 725-727).

I Company—Director—Misfeasance—Improper payment of dividends—Need to prove culpable and gross negligence—Right to trust officers of company not to conceal material matters—Prima facie liability for misstatements to shareholders.

In considering charges of misfeasance against a director relating to the improper payment of dividends, it is the duty of the court to examine the state of things as they appeared to the director when the dividends were declared and to determine whether he was justified in what he did by what he knew or ought to have known. If a director acts within his powers and with such care as is reasonably to be expected from him having regard to his knowledge and experience, and if he acts honestly for the benefit of the company, he discharges his equitable as well as his legal duty to the company. For negligence to be established against him it is not sufficient to prove an omission to take all possible care; his conduct must be shown to be in a business sense culpable and gross. A director acting honestly is not to be held liable for negligence because he trusts the officers of the company, regarding whom he knows no reason why they should be distrusted, not to conceal from him what they ought to report. On the other hand, while a director is not an insurer, if he makes misstatements to his shareholders he is liable for the consequences unless he can show that he made them honestly, believing them to be true, and took such care to ascertain the truth as was reasonable at the time.

Appeal by John Cory, a director of the National Bank of Wales, from an order made by WRIGHT, J., declaring him liable to make good £37,000 in respect of dividends declared and paid out of the company's funds in and between July, 1887, and January, 1891, and ordering him to pay that sum with interest at 5 per cent., but without prejudice to the right, if any, which he might have to repayment by the shareholders of the company of what he might pay. B

The bank was in voluntary liquidation, and the order was made on a summons taken out on June 14, 1895, under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 [see now s. 333 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948: 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452], by the liquidator, and asked for a declaration that Cory as director was guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust (i) in authorising, sanctioning, or participating in the payment to shareholders of the company of interest or dividends on their respective shares out of the capital of the company, and was liable and might be ordered to repay to the liquidator the amount so paid during the period in which he acted as director; (ii) in making or sanctioning improper advances out of the funds of the company in contravention of the articles, whereby a loss accrued to the company, and that he might be ordered to pay to the liquidator the amount of that loss; (iii) in making or sanctioning improper advances to customers, and allowing overdrawn accounts and debts of customers to continue, with knowledge that those customers were, or were reputed to be, insolvent or otherwise unable to pay the amount of their indebtedness, whereby a loss had accrued to the company, and that, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the liability of the said Cory in respect of the matters aforesaid, all necessary accounts and inquiries might be directed to be taken and made; and that in taking and making such accounts and inquiries the whole period during which the said Cory acted as director might be considered notwithstanding that six years might have elapsed from the commencement thereof, on the ground that the losses arising from the wrongful acts aforesaid and the true state of affairs of the company were fraudulently concealed by Cory, and that he issued balance-sheets which were false to his knowledge, and, moreover, that part of such interest and dividends were retained by Cory and converted to his own use as a shareholder of the company; and that he might be ordered to pay to the liquidator the full amount of all such losses. The liquidator gave a cross-notice of appeal asking for the further order claimed by the summons. C

The following statement of the further facts is taken from the judgment of the court. The National Bank of Wales was a limited banking company formed in 1879. Its objects were to carry on the business of bankers, including the making of advances and the acquisition of other businesses. Its capital was £2,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £20 each. The shares issued were never paid-up in full, £10 being paid-up, and the remaining £10 being uncalled, and forming, therefore, a large sum available in case of need. The number of shares increased from time to time. In 1884 the paid-up capital amounted to £125,000, and it so remained until 1890, when it was increased to £225,000. H

The company's principal bank and its head office were at Cardiff, where the directors met and the general manager was in daily attendance. The company had also many branch banks, each with its own manager. The course of business was this. Each branch manager sent weekly to the head office what was called a weekly statement—i.e., an account showing how the assets and liabilities of the branch stood, what advances or overdrafts had been made or allowed, and to whom, what securities the bank held, and other matters. Every quarter each branch manager made a more formal return to the head office, showing the position of the branch and the business done during the past quarter. It was the duty of the general manager to examine those documents, and to report to the board anything I

A disclosed by them which required their attention. The weekly statements and quarterly returns were in the board room for reference in case of need, but, unless attention was called to them the directors did not think it necessary to examine them.

B The chairman of the directors was Thomas Cory, a brother of John Cory. The chairman and the general manager (Mr. Collins) visited each branch bank every year; and, in addition, two skilled inspectors frequently went round and inspected the accounts and reported to the general manager. The accounts of the branch banks appear, however, not to have been separately audited by professional accountants. The auditors employed to examine the company's accounts, and to certify the annual balance-sheets and accounts laid before the shareholders, only saw the head office books and the returns from the branch offices, certified by their respective managers to the head office. These certified returns formed part of the weekly statements, but omitted much that they contained. The minutes of the directors' meetings showed that, speaking generally, they attended with reasonable regularity and transacted a large amount of business. No director, unless it was the chairman, attended to any details not brought before the board either by the chairman or by the general manager.

D After John Cory had ceased to be a director the company made large advances on insufficient security, and took over an insolvent business which greatly embarrassed it. The company, however, was not unable to pay its debts, for its large uncalled capital was amply sufficient for that purpose, and, so far as its outside liabilities are concerned, it always has been and is quite able to discharge them in full. Being, however, in difficulties, the bank determined to amalgamate with another company and to wind-up. An agreement was entered into between the E National Bank and the Metropolitan Bank for the transfer to the Metropolitan Bank of all the assets of the National Bank (except the uncalled capital) and for the payment by the Metropolitan Bank of all the debts and liabilities of the National Bank, subject, however, to this stipulation—namely, that if the assets transferred exceeded the liabilities, the excess should be returned to the National Bank, while if the assets transferred should prove insufficient to discharge those liabilities, the deficiency should be made good by the National Bank. There was a deficiency of about £41,000, which the National Bank had to make good. The sum could be raised by a call on the shareholders, but they objected to that if money could be got in from other quarters which would relieve them from the necessity of paying a call. The investigation into the affairs of the National Bank, which had been G made in order to carry out the amalgamation with the Metropolitan Bank revealed that the whole of the paid-up capital had been lost and the cause of the loss was to a large extent attributable to the fact that a large number of debts due to the bank by its customers had turned out to be bad, and that large sums advanced to directors and owing by them were irrecoverable. Moreover, large dividends had been paid for a number of years as if the bank were flourishing, while, in truth, H if its affairs had been properly conducted, those dividends ought never to have been recommended by the directors.

I Aug. 2, 1899. The judgment of the court was read by

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R. The appeal and cross-appeal require the court to examine into Mr. John Cory's conduct as a director of the company from the time when he became a director in 1884 until he ceased to be so in December, 1890, or even later if the liquidator is correct. The order under review was made on a summons issued under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, on June 14, 1895, a date which is material, having regard to the statute of limitations, on which Mr. Cory relies as a defence to the greater part of the demands made against him. A

It will be convenient to consider his appeal first. This raises the question whether the funds of the company have been misapplied in payment of dividends, and, if they have, whether Mr. Cory is liable for that misapplication. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts set out hereinbefore, and, referring to the affidavit of John Cory as to the general course of business and his cross-examination, said:] B WRIGHT, J., regarded this evidence as an admission by John Cory of a total abnegation of the use of his faculties, and of an entire neglect of his duties. We cannot go so far as this. His evidence does, however, show that he only attended, when present, to whatever his attention was called; and that having no suspicion that anything was wrong he made no special inquiries in order to ascertain that all was right. C There can be no doubt that the shareholders were grievously deceived by the reports and balance-sheets laid before them; and no one can be surprised at their anger with their directors, and especially with the chairman and general manager, both of whom have been criminally prosecuted and convicted for their fraudulent conduct.

John Cory's answer, however, to the attempt to make him liable for the losses sustained and dividends paid while he was a director is that he was himself as much deceived as the shareholders by the chairman and manager, and that he was not guilty of any breach of his duty in not making special investigation when he had no reason to suppose that anything was wrong. WRIGHT, J., has come to the conclusion that John Cory was not only negligent, but fraudulent, or, at all events, guilty of misconduct equivalent to fraud as regards its legal consequences. D The learned judge has arrived at this conclusion from the fact that in their reports the directors unjustifiably stated that they had made provision for bad and doubtful debts, whereas they had not. That the chairman and manager knew this is very likely true, but that John Cory knew it is quite another matter. The table of bad debts shows that sums were constantly written off for bad debts, and there is nothing to justify the inference that John Cory knew that these sums were E insufficient, or that he did not honestly believe them to be sufficient. It may be that he ought to have been more vigilant than he was, and that he should not have trusted his brother and Collins so much as he did. But negligence is one thing, fraud is another, and we are quite unable to adopt the view of WRIGHT, J., that John Cory acted fraudulently in making reports to the shareholders and laying the balance-sheets before them. At the close of the argument for the liquidator we F intimated that, in our opinion, the charge of fraud against John Cory failed, and further study of the evidence has strengthened this conviction. This is not only a very important matter to him as regards character, but to a great extent it G relieves him from responsibility for anything done or omitted before June 14, 1889.

Another part of the case on which we are unable to agree with WRIGHT, J., relates to the date of John Cory's retirement from the board. There can be no doubt that he H sent in a letter of resignation (although it was not produced), and that his resignation was accepted at a meeting of directors held in London on Dec. 18, 1890, and that he was informed of its acceptance on Dec. 22, 1890. There can also be no doubt that his resignation was concealed from the shareholders until after their meeting on Jan. 21, 1891, and that, in the report then laid before the shareholders, the name of John Cory appeared as a director. The evidence is conflicting upon I the question whether his resignation was or was not mentioned at the meeting. On the other hand, he was not present at it; he swears he did not know that his name still appeared as a director. The learned judge says he is unable to believe that John Cory did not know that his name so appeared, and in the view of the court below John Cory improperly allowed his retirement to be concealed, and allowed himself to be held out as a continuing director and as concurring in the report of January, 1891, which the learned judge holds to be as fraudulent on John Cory's part as those which preceded it. We cannot adopt the learned judge's view

A of this part of the case. We are satisfied that John Cory's resignation was bona fide and a fact, not a sham. He was not in fact a director after his resignation was accepted. He took no part in drawing up the report nor in recommending the dividend declared in January, 1891. Even if he received the report before the meeting and saw his name as a director and did not insist that his name should be struck out or that his resignation should be mentioned to the meeting (and the case B against him cannot be put more strongly than this), even then we fail to see how such knowledge and omission can, without more, make him liable for misapplying the funds of the company; when in truth he took no part in their misapplication.

With these preliminary observations, we pass to consider John Cory's liability in respect of the dividends declared in July and December, 1889, and July, 1890. C The liquidator has taken the view that the dividends declared and paid by the company when John Cory was a director were all paid out of the capital of the company, and the evidence adduced by the liquidator is directed to prove that such was the case. But when this evidence is examined it seems quite plain that the dividends were not in fact paid out of any part of the money forming the paid-up nominal capital of the company, but were paid, notwithstanding the loss D of that capital and without making it good. What was done was this. The accounts were made up annually. Such losses incurred during the year as the directors recognised as losses were written off or provided for by carrying sums of money over to a reserve fund, and the balance of the receipts in each year over the outgoings in the same year (after making some allowance for bad debts and deductions for sums carried over to the reserve fund) were treated as the E profits of that year, and were divided as dividends. Losses written off in one year were not brought forward the next year so as to diminish the profits of that year, but were simply ignored, a fresh start being made every year and dividends being declared out of the excess of the annual receipts over the annual expenses. The effect of this was to throw all bad debts written off and not provided for by an increase of the reserve fund on the capital, and to diminish the paid-up capital F year by year, and nevertheless to keep paying dividends out of the excess of the annual receipts over the annual expenses.

It is obvious that this method of procedure, if long continued, would ultimately exhaust the paid-up capital of the company, and the first disastrous year in which the current outgoings exceeded the current incomings would produce great embarrassments. Such a mode of dealing with the company's assets, however G reprehensible, must nevertheless not be confounded with paying dividends out of the paid-up capital of the company. The paid-up capital of a limited company cannot be lawfully returned to the shareholders under the guise of dividends or otherwise. Even an article of association authorising the payment of interest to shareholders on the amounts paid upon their shares cannot authorise a payment of such interest out of capital: see Re Sharpe, Re Bennett Masonic and General H Life Assurance Co. v. Sharpe (1). But paid-up capital which is lost can no more be applied in paying dividends than in paying debts. Its loss renders any subsequent application of it impossible. There was no such dealing with the paid-up capital of the company in this case as to amount to an illegal application of it.

Further, it is not possible for the court to say that the law prohibits a limited company, even a limited banking company, from paying dividends unless its I paid-up capital is intact. Suppose a heavy, unexpected loss is sustained; it must be met if there are assets to meet it with. The capital, even uncalled capital, must if necessary be applied to meet it. Such an application of capital is a perfectly legitimate use of it. There is no law which in the case supposed prevents the payment of all future dividends until all the capital so expended is made good. Many honest and prudent men of business would replace a large loss of capital by degrees and reduce the dividends, but not stop them entirely, until the whole loss was made good. No law compels them to pay no dividend at all. There are cases in which no honest competent man of business would think of charging particular debts or expenses to capital. We are certainly not prepared to sanction the notion that all debts incurred in carrying on a business can be properly permanently charged to capital, and that the excess of receipts over the other outgoings can be afterwards properly divided as profit, as if there had been no previous loss. No honest competent man engaged in trade or commerce would carry on business on such a principle. But, excluding cases in which everyone can see that a particular debt or outlay cannot be reasonably charged to capital, it may be safely said that what losses can be properly charged to capital and what to income is a matter for business men to determine, and is often a matter on which opinions of honest and competent men differ: see Gregory v. Patchett (2).

There is no hard and fast legal rule on the subject. There can, however, be no doubt that if expenses or payments are obviously improperly charged to capital, and are so charged simply to swell the apparent profits and to make it appear that dividends may be properly declared, dividends declared and paid under such circumstances cannot be treated as legitimately paid out of profits, and can no more be justified than if they were paid out of capital. This was determined in Bloxam v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (3), and has been acted upon in many other cases—e.g., Re County Marine Insurance Co., Rance's Case (4), Re Oxford Benefit Building and Investment Society (5), Leeds Estate, Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd (6) and Re London and General Bank (No. 2) (7) ([1895] 2 Ch. at p. 686). It would seem that SIR GEORGE JESSEL inclined to the opinion that a limited company could not pay dividends unless its paid-up capital was kept up: see Re Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron, and Coal Co. (8). But no decision has yet gone this length, and it has since been decided that dividends may be paid, even by a limited company, although its nominal capital is not kept up: see Verner v. General and Commercial Investment Trust (9); and the earlier case of Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co. (10). What was lost there was fixed capital, and it is obvious that circulating capital or any other money employed in earning returns must be deducted from them in order to ascertain how much of them can be regarded as profit. If the returns do not exceed the money spent in procuring them (whether that money be called circulating capital or any other name) there can be no profits, and no ingenious process of book-keeping can alter the fact.

It is not denied in this case that the annual receipts did exceed the annual outgoings, and, the dividends having been paid out of the excess, the allegation that they were paid out of capital is not accurate. But, as already pointed out, it does not at all follow that the course adopted by the directors, in declaring dividends year after year as they did, was legally justifiable. It cannot be denied that the balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts concealed the truth (as now known) from the shareholders, and were, as it now turns out, grievously misleading. The shareholders were never told that the paid-up capital was being constantly diminished by bad debts, as now appears to have been the case. The shareholders were told every year that proper provision was made for those debts, and now that the case has been thoroughly investigated it is really reduced to the question whether John Cory was justified in making the statements he did and in dealing as he did with debts which have now been ascertained to be bad. It is easy to be wise after the event, and there is danger in treating a director as knowing years ago what now appears to be the fact. But it is the duty of the court to examine the state of things as they appeared to him when the dividends were declared, and to determine whether he was justified in what he did by what he knew and ought to have known. What he ought to have known is as important as what he knew.

It was stated in the judgment of this court in Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate (11) that if directors act within their powers, if they act with such care as is reasonably to be expected from them having regard to their knowledge and experience, and if they act honestly for the benefit of the company they represent, they discharge their equitable as well as their legal duty to that company. We

A believe this statement of the law to be correct, and we adopt it as our guide. It has been shown that in this case the dividends did not, in fact, come out of the paid-up capital of the company. Fraud is not established against John Cory, nor is there any proof that he was acting in the interests of his own friends or of himself and not bona fide with a view to the interest of the National Bank. The inquiry, therefore, so far as he is concerned, is reduced to the representations he made as to the position of the company and of his alleged want of care and attention to the affairs of the bank, and more particularly to his omission to find out that the manager was misleading the directors. In Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate (11) it was said, and we repeat, that the amount of care to be taken is difficult to define; but it is plain that directors are not liable for all the mistakes they may make, although if they had taken more care they might have avoided them: see Overend and Gurney Co. v. Gibb (12). Their negligence must be not the omission to take all possible care; it must be much more blameable than that; it must be in a business sense culpable or gross. We do not know how better to describe it. Some useful observations justifying the expression "gross negligence" will be found in LORD CHELMSFORD'S judgment in Giblin v. McMullen (13) (L.R. 2 P.C. at p. 336).

D It is not, however, necessary to enlarge on this subject. The care, which in any case can be reasonably expected to be taken, is, speaking generally, the measure of the care which the law requires to be taken where there is no contract affecting the question. What we have to determine is whether John Cory was justified in making the statements he made, and whether he could be reasonably expected to find out more than he in fact knew. Bad and doubtful debts were constantly considered and provided for; some being written off; some by setting aside reserve capital; £12,000 odd were written off before 1890, and £13,600, or thereabouts, were written off in that year, and £70,000 was set aside for reserve capital. Such matters were considered by the directors. The accusation is that they did not do enough in this way. But here again, even if some debts known to the manager to be bad, were treated as good, it is not proved that John Cory knew this or had reason to suspect that what was done was inadequate. His evidence is clear that he neither knew nor suspected that such was the case, and that he really believed that the provision was ample.

F The same question arises: Was it his duty to test the accuracy or completeness of what he was told by the general manager and managing director? This is a question on which opinions may differ, but we are not prepared to say that he failed in his legal duty. Business cannot be carried on on principles of distrust. Men in responsible positions must be trusted by those above them as well as by those below them until there is reason to distrust them. We agree that care and prudence do not involve distrust, but for a director acting honestly himself to be held legally liable for negligence in trusting the officers under him not to conceal from him what they ought to report to him appears to us to be laying too heavy a burden on honest business men. But this is the whole of John Cory's shortcoming as proved by the evidence. . . . Cases such as these are always cases of degree. In Leeds Estate, Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd (6) the directors trusted their manager and were held liable. They did not take the trouble to see that what he did was even apparently what he ought to have done. They delegated their functions to him. Re Denham & Co. (14) is more like the present case, and there the director was held not liable.

I It must be now conceded that if John Cory had himself studied the weekly statements and quarterly returns and had compared those for one period with those for another, and more especially if he had seen the letters addressed by the auditors to the directors, he would have been put upon inquiry, and would have found out, if he had not neglected his duty, that the affairs of the bank were not in the flourishing condition which he believed them to be in. . . . We are satisfied that these letters from the auditors were fraudulently concealed from John Cory, and that he never knew of, or suspected, their existence. His ignorance of them was not attributable to negligence on his part. John Cory's omission to examine the weekly statements and quarterly returns is also, we think, excusable, although not on the same grounds, for they were known by him to exist, and were in the board room for inspection. We have had the advantage of an exhaustive examination of them, and of a comparison of long series of them, and we know the result and their full significance. But without a comparison of those for one period with those of an earlier period a director would derive little information that was really useful. No suspicion being aroused, John Cory's reasons for not examining them are natural, and his omission to examine them does not show want of reasonable care and attention on his part to the affairs of the bank. He had no reason to suppose that there were unsatisfactory debts beyond those written off and provided for.

The evidence when carefully sifted unquestionably shows that Mr. Cory might have found out that he was deceived by the general manager, and that the dividends declared were not in a business sense warranted by the profit made. On the other hand, the evidence shows that, although he was deceived, he neither knew nor suspected it. We are not prepared to say that he is guilty of any breach of duty in not discovering that those whom he trusted were misleading him; nor that in point of law he was guilty of any breach of duty in recommending the payment of dividends as and when he did. A director does not warrant the truth of his statements; he is not an insurer. But if he makes misstatements to his shareholders he is liable for the consequences unless he can show that he made them honestly, believing them to be true, and took such care to ascertain the truth as was reasonable at the time. This, we think, Mr. Cory did. It follows that Mr. John Cory is not only not liable to make good the dividends declared, but also that he is not liable to refund those which he himself received as a shareholder, whether before or after June 14, 1889, for there was no breach of trust in this matter by him.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with a question of fact which does not call for report and concluded:] We think it only due to the liquidator to add that, although Mr. Cory has succeeded in his appeal, his conduct justified the closest scrutiny, but the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and, having regard to the serious charges made against him, the liquidator must pay Mr. Cory his costs both of the summons and of his appeal.

Appeal allowed.

[Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

DOVEY AND OTHERS v. CORY

The liquidator appealed to the House of Lords who, on Aug. 1, 1901, dismissed the appeal.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., said that a great part of the judgments of WRIGHT, J., and of the Court of Appeal, was occupied by discussing matters which were not now before their Lordships as matters in debate. He was very clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right and ought to be affirmed, but his opinion was entirely based on the question of fact that Mr. Cory was guilty of no breach of duty whatever. He was very anxious not to deal with some reasons given for their judgment by the Court of Appeal, which, in the view of the fact that he took, did not now arise.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and concluded:] I am very reluctant to give any opinion on the question whether the sum paid in dividends was properly divisible, inasmuch as the question may arise, and then it may be necessary to

A decide it. I deprecate any premature judgment. I am, as I have said, very reluctant to enter into a question, which does not arise here, into which the Court of Appeal has entered at some length. The only reason why I refer to it at all is lest by silence I should be supposed to adopt a course of reasoning as to the correctness of which I am not satisfied. I doubt very much whether such questions can ever be treated in the abstract at all. The mode and manner in which B a business is carried on, and what is usual or the reverse, may have a considerable influence in determining the question what may be treated as profits and what as capital. Even the distinction between fixed and floating capital which in an abstract treatise like ADAM SMITH'S WEALTH OF NATIONS is appropriate enough, may with reference to a concrete case be quite inappropriate. It is easy to lay down as an abstract proposition that you must not pay dividends out of capital, but the C application of that very plain proposition may raise questions of the utmost difficulty in their solution. I desire, as I have said, not to express any opinion, but as an illustration of what difficulties may arise the example given by the learned counsel of one ship being lost out of a considerable number, and the question whether all dividends must be stopped until the value of that lost ship is made good out of the further earnings of the company or partnership, is one which one would have to D deal with. On the one hand, people put their money into a trading concern to give them an income, and the sudden stoppage of all dividends would send down the value of their shares to zero and possibly involve their ruin. On the other hand, companies cannot at their will and without the precautions enforced by the statute reduce their capital; but what are profits and what is capital may be a difficult and sometimes an almost impossible problem to solve. When the time comes that E these questions come before us in a concrete case we must deal with them, but until they do, I, for one, decline to express an opinion not called for by the particular facts before us, and I am the more averse to doing so because I foresee that many matters will have to be considered by men of business which are not altogether familiar to a court of law.

F LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD DAVEY said that he would refer to three cases, which contained the whole law upon the subject. He continued: In Re Mercantile Trading Co., Stringer's Case (15) the business of the company in question was of an extremely G speculative and hazardous character, and the directors had paid a dividend on the estimated value of assets which were afterwards totally lost. It was held that, the estimate having been made bona fide, and without any intention to defraud anybody, a director could not be made liable, when the company was wound-up, to replace the money. In Rance's Case (4) LORD ROMILLY, M.R., laid down the principle which he thought governed cases of this description thus (6 Ch. App. at p. H 109):

"When an improper payment has been made, if it be a mere error of judgment, it cannot be recovered; if it be a fraudulent payment then it can."

The learned judge explained what he meant by a fraudulent payment:

I "I mean one where the person who makes it, or is concerned in making it, is at the time aware of the impropriety of making it, but does so in order to obtain a benefit for himself. . . . The director may be ignorant of this fact, but if his ignorance arises from his wilfully shutting his eyes to the facts which are before him, he is equally guilty."

I think that this statement of the law is very nearly, but not quite, accurate. In my opinion, it is not necessary that the motive of the improper payment should be to obtain a benefit for the director himself. I also understand LORD ROMILLY to include in the expression "wilfully shutting his eyes" culpable negligence, or reckless indifference by the director in the performance of his duties. LORD ROMILLY decided that case in favour of the director. The Court of Appeal took a different view of the facts from that taken by LORD ROMILLY, and held that the directors, in the preparation of the so-called balance-sheet, had not followed the directions in their articles of association, and that the balance-sheet did not in fact purport to show a profit out of which a dividend could be paid. In that case there can be no doubt of the liability of the director who took part in the payment of the dividend.

Leeds Estate, Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd (6), before STIRLING, J., was a case of the same description. The directors had not followed the directions contained in the articles of association. The learned judge in the course of his judgment states the law thus (36 Ch.D. at p. 801) :

"It seems to me that the views expressed by the learned judges who decided Rance's Case (4) are consistent with the proposition that directors who are proved in fact to have paid a dividend out of capital fail to excuse themselves if they have not taken reasonable care to secure the preparation of estimates and statements of account, such as it was their duty to prepare and submit to the shareholders, and have declared the dividends complained of without having exercised thereon their judgment as mercantile men on the estimates and statements of account submitted to them."

I agree in this statement of the law, and I do not think it inconsistent with that of LORD ROMILLY, properly understood, and subject to the observation which I have already made upon it. It is by this standard that the conduct of Mr. Cory must be judged in this case. In his affidavit, he states generally that he was from first to last under the honest and genuine belief that the affairs of the company were in a sound and solvent condition, and that its business was being carried on at a profit, and that its net profits for the time being were amply sufficient to justify the dividends which were from time to time during his directorship paid to the shareholders. He adds that the general manager and branch managers were, so far as he knew, men of unquestioned competence and integrity, and that he and his co-directors were compelled by the magnitude of the business and the exigencies of the case generally to rely upon (and he did rely upon) these officials in all ordinary matters relating to the accounts of customers and other questions of detail. . . . I think that Mr. Cory was bound to give his attention to and exercise his judgment as a man of business on the matters which were brought before the board at the meetings which he attended, and it is not proved that he did not do so. But I think that he was entitled to rely upon the judgment, information, and advice of the chairman and general manager, as to whose integrity, skill and competence he had no reason for suspicion. I agree with what was said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Hallmark's Case (16), and by CHITTY, J., in Re Denham & Co. (14), that directors are not bound to examine entries in the company's book. It was the duty of the general manager and, possibly, the chairman to go carefully through the returns from the branches, and to bring before the board any matter requiring their consideration, but Mr. Cory was not, in my opinion, guilty of negligence in not examining them for himself, notwithstanding that they were laid on the table of the board for reference. The case is no doubt one of some difficulty, but the liquidator has not made out to my satisfaction that Mr. Cory wilfully (as that term is explained in the cases) misappropriated the company's funds in payment of dividends.

What I have said is sufficient for the decision of this appeal. But I desire to express my dissent from some propositions of law laid down in the Court of Appeal. The learned judges seem to have thought that a joint stock company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, may write off capital losses incurred in previous years, and may in any subsequent year, if the receipts for that year exceed the outgoings, pay dividends out of such excess without making up the

A capital account. If this proposition be well founded it appears to me that a company whose capital is not represented by available assets need never trouble itself to reduce its capital, with the leave of the court and subject to the other conditions imposed by the Companies Act, 1877, in order to enable itself to pay dividends out of current receipts. It may be that I have misapprehended the statement of law intended to be made by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. I think that possible, because I find that in Verner v. General and Commercial Investment Trust (9), LINDLEY, L.J., says ([1894] 2 Ch. at p. 266):

C “Perhaps the shortest way of expressing the distinction which I am endeavouring to explain is to say that fixed capital may be sunk or lost, and yet the excess of current receipts over current payments may be divided, but that floating or circulating capital must be kept up, as otherwise it will enter into and form part of such excess, in which case to divide such excess without deducting the capital which forms part of it will be contrary to law.”

D I reserve my opinion as to the effect of an actual and ascertained loss of part of the company's fixed capital, as in the case put of a loss of a ship uninsured. But, subject to this observation, I think that the statement of law in the passage which I have quoted is not open to objection, and it is only because the learned judge appears to me to have departed from it in his judgment in the present case that I have troubled your Lordships with these remarks. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

E LORD BRAMPTON concurred.

When goods distrained for rent are impounded on demised premises they are in the possession of the law and anyone removing them is liable to an action for pound breach under s. 10 of the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, even though the landlord has abandoned possession of the goods. Abandonment of possession is not in itself an abandonment of the distress though in certain circumstances it may be evidence of an intention to abandon the distress.

Appeal by the plaintiff from Southwark County Court in an action of pound breach.

The plaintiff was the owner of a house, No. 151, Fentiman Road, Clapham, which was let to a tenant. The rent being in arrear, the plaintiff, on Wednesday, July 13, 1898, distrained on the premises. The goods distrained upon were not in any way interfered with—as by putting them in a separate room—but a man was left in possession by the bailiff. Among the goods seized was a certain amount of furniture which the tenant had obtained from the defendant on the hire purchase system. As all the instalments had not been paid, this furniture was, at the time of the distress, the property of the defendant. The man in possession remained on the premises on Thursday and Friday until 10 p.m., when, as there was no sleeping accommodation, he went home for the night. It appeared that during this time the agent of the defendant was attempting to regain possession of the furniture belonging to him in some way that would not constitute an infraction of the law. These attempts came to the knowledge of the man in possession. On Saturday night, about 8 p.m., he left the premises with the intention of not coming back again till Monday morning, being under the impression, as he declared at the time, that the defendant would make no attempt during Saturday night or Sunday to obtain his goods. About half an hour after he left the defendant did come to the premises, and, after learning of the intention of the man in possession of returning on Monday, took possession of his goods and removed them from the house to his own premises. The plaintiff, on finding that the goods had been removed, brought an action in the county court under s. 10 of the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, for pound breach, claiming treble damages under that section and under s. 3 of the Distress for Rent Act, 1689. The county court judge found as a fact that the plaintiff, by the man in possession leaving the premises, had abandoned the possession, but held he had not abandoned the distress. On the ground, however, that to sustain an action for pound breach the goods removed must be in the actual possession of the landlord, he held that no action in this case would lie. The plaintiff appealed. E

LAWRANCE, J.—The only question raised in this case is whether as against the true owner of the goods taken in distress actual possession is necessary to found an action of pound breach. The question is the same as against the true owner and as

A against the tenant. The goods were distrainable, not because they are the tenant's, but because they are on the demised premises at the time of the distress. The question, then, is, is real possession necessary to maintain an action of pound breach against anyone taking away goods distrained for rent and impounded on the tenant's premises? The county court judge has come to the conclusion that it is. I think he is wrong. The goods having been seized and impounded, it is clear, on the authority of Bannister v. Hyde (1), that it is not necessary that possession should be retained by the landlord in order to sustain an action of pound breach for their removal from the premises where they are impounded. There is no need to keep a man in possession on the premises. Once the goods are impounded, they are in the custody of the law. It is not necessary to go into the question as to what constitutes an impounding. No question as to whether there was or was not a proper impounding was raised at the trial. The county court judge had come to the conclusion that, assuming there was a proper impounding, it was necessary, in order to maintain this action, that real possession of the goods must be shown. He was wrong in this, and the appeal must be allowed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The county court judge seems to have been misled by Bagshawes, Ltd. v. Deacon (2). That was not a case of distress, but a case relating to execution. The difference between the two is this: In the case of seizure in execution, the possession of the sheriff is itself the possession of the law; as soon as his possession ceases, the possession of the law ceases. But when goods are seized in distress, as soon as they are impounded they are placed in the custody of the law. Formerly as soon as they were impounded they ceased ipso facto to be in the possession of the distrainer, and now, though they usually remain in his possession, it is not necessary they should do so. Once they are impounded, they are in the custody of the law, whether they remain in his possession or not. To sustain an action for pound breach, it is necessary to show, not that the goods were in the distrainer's possession, but that they were in the possession of the law—that they have been and are impounded. That is what is meant by an action for pound breach—an action for taking the goods out of the custody of the law.

The question raised before the county court was, whether it is necessary, in order to keep the goods in the custody of the law, that the party distraining should retain possession. As I have said, it is clear that there has been and is an impounding of the goods distrained. This is not necessary. The only question raised by an abandonment of possession is whether the abandonment of possession is such as to show an abandonment of the distress. The abandonment of possession might under certain circumstances be conclusive evidence of this. That appears from the judgment of CROMPTON, J., in Bannister v. Hyde (1). But once it is shown not to amount to an abandonment of possession there was no difficulty in maintaining an action of pound breach if there was a proper impounding. What constitutes a proper impounding on the premises is very difficult to say. There is a strange absence of authority on the point. Taking possession of the goods with the manifest intention of keeping possession of them was probably sufficient. But the question does not arise in this case. The county judge assumed that there had been an impounding. He held that, there having been an impounding, possession was necessary to sustain an action for pound breach. In this he was wrong, and, if further authority were necessary to support this view, I would refer to Kemp v. Christmas (3). The point was not discussed there, but it was assumed throughout that, if the goods were once impounded, there was no need to prove actual possession in order to support the action.

From this decision the defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Nov. 10, 1899. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Upon this appeal no question is open whether or not the goods had been impounded. The county court judge found that they had been impounded, and leave to appeal has only been given on the assumption that the county court judge was correct on this point. The only question for our decision is whether a man must always remain in possession of goods that have been impounded in order to keep them in the custody of the law. That question hardly needs an answer. Where there has been an impounding, there is no need that someone should remain in actual possession.

Bailment—Gratuitous bailment—Duty of care of bailor—Gratuitous loan of article—Defect in article lent—Injury to bailee as result of defect—Liability of bailor.

The gratuitous lender of a chattel for use by the borrower is not liable to the borrower for any injury caused by a defect in the chattel unless he knew of the defect and, either deliberately or by gross negligence, did not inform the borrower of the existence of the defect.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment, or for a new trial.

The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries sustained through the explosion of a boiler on the defendants' ship. The defendants employed a stevedore to ballast their vessel which was lying in dock. The stevedore employed a gang of men to do the work, of whom the plaintiff was one. The work was to be done by means of a hand winch. The men asked the master of the vessel to permit them to use the ship's donkey engine to help them in their work, and the master consented on condition that they employed and paid a competent man to work the engine, which was done. There was a plate on the boiler of the engine with the date 1887, the maker's name, and the words "proved up to 120lb." It appeared from the evidence that the engine had been regularly used for the purposes of the ship up to that time. The boiler burst while the engine was being used in the work of ballasting, and the plaintiff was injured. It was proved that the boiler burst when working at a pressure of about 50lb., and that it was so defective that it could not safely stand a pressure of more than 15lb. There was no evidence that the defendants or the master of the ship knew that the boiler was defective. The action was tried before HAWKINS, J., with a jury, and at the close of the plaintiff's case the learned judge held that the defendants, as gratuitous lenders, could not be liable unless they knew of the defective condition of the boiler, and he therefore directed the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This was an action brought by a man in the employment of a stevedore who was injured by an explosion of the donkey engine of a ship. The action was to recover damages from the owners of the ship. The facts of the case are very short. The plaintiff was engaged by the stevedore as one of a gang to ballast the ship, working by means of a hand winch. The men did not want to work with a hand winch, and they asked the master to allow them to use the donkey engine of the ship. The master said that they might use the engine if they would employ and pay an efficient man to work it; the matter was so arranged, and the use of the engine was given to the men. During the progress of the work the boiler of the engine exploded and the plaintiff was injured. The point was taken at the trial that it was clear on the evidence in support of the plaintiff's case that there was a gratuitous bailment of the donkey engine to the men. It seems to me that it is impossible to say that there was anything in the evidence adduced by the plaintiff to show that this was not a gratuitous bailment. On that question, therefore, there was no evidence to be left to the jury.

Then there was a point of law raised as to what is the duty of the bailor to the bailee in the case of a gratuitous bailment. The law on that point was clearly laid down in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (1), where the judgment of the court was delivered by COLERIDGE, J. From that case it is clear that, where there is a gratuitous bailment, the bailee has no cause of action against the bailor unless he can show that, when the chattel was bailed, the bailor knew that it was not fit for the purpose for which it was lent. It has been contended that that is not the rule, but that the rule is that the bailee has a cause of action if there has been gross negligence on the part of the bailor. In my opinion, the law is that, if there has been gross negligence on the part of the bailor in not communicating to the bailee that which he knew as to the condition of the chattel, the bailor will be liable. The law does not go any further than that. The judgment in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (2) was approved in MacCarthy v. Young (2), and the law was again laid down in the same way.

In my opinion Moffatt v. Bateman (3) in the Privy Council does not apply in the present case. That was not a case of the gratuitous bailment or loan of a chattel. In that case the defendant drove the plaintiff in his carriage, and it was held that he must not be guilty of gross negligence in driving the plaintiff. In the present case, even supposing that gross negligence would be sufficient to support the action, where is the evidence of gross negligence or, indeed, of any kind of negligence? There is none at all. The onus is on the bailee to prove some facts to show that the bailor was guilty of negligence in not disclosing the defect in the thing lent. This case is absolutely devoid of any evidence of any knowledge, or of any negligence on the part of the bailor. It is said that the plate on the boiler was an intimation that the boiler was efficient; but it only states that at one time it was tested by the makers to a certain pressure. That is no evidence on which the defendants can be made liable. The appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur in the judgment delivered by A. L. SMITH, L.J. It is quite clear that, in the case of a gratuitous bailment, in order to render the bailor liable to the bailee, there must be the concealment of some material fact, or such negligence in not communicating something with reference to the article lent as would amount to the same thing as concealment, for instance, in the case of the loan of an article which has not been used for a long time. There are no such facts in the present case, and there is no evidence of any concealment or negligence to make the bailor liable. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my judgment, this is purely a case of a lender and borrower, and I will confine my observations to that class of cases. It is clear that there may be cases of gratuitous bailment where there is an obligation on the bailor which does not attach to a person who lends gratuitously. There may be a gratuitous bailment for the benefit of both parties, which is not a mere loan for the benefit of the bailee. The evidence in this case does not bring it within the cases of invitor and invitee. There was no kind of invitation by the lender to use this engine for his benefit. What then, is the duty of a lender? That duty has been defined in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (1) and MacCarthy v. Young (2). The lender is bound to communicate to the borrower information of any defects in the article lent of which he is aware. If he knows of a defect and deliberately withholds the information from the borrower, that is a fraud and he will be liable. If he knows of a defect and by gross negligence fails to communicate the information to the borrower, that amounts to the same thing, and he will be liable.

The plaintiff has relied on a passage in POTHIER'S TRAITE DU PRET A USAGE, para. 84, which is as follows :

“Une autre espèce d'obligation du prêteur envers l'emprunteur, c'est celle de lui donner avis des défauts de la chose qu'on lui demande à emprunteur, lorsqu'il en a connoissance, et que ces défauts peuvent causer du dommage à l'emprunteur. Le prêteur, faute d'avoir satisfait à cette obligation, est tenu, actione contrariâ commodati, de tout ce que l'emprunteur a souffert du vice de la chose prêtée, dont il n'a pas été averti. Il y en a un exemple en la Loi 18, s. 3, où il est dit :

En général, le prêteur doit donner avis à l'emprunteur, de tout ce qu'il a intérêt de savoir par rapport à la chose qu'il lui prête; et si par dol ou par une faute lourde, il manque de lui en donner connoissance, il est tenu envers lui, actione contrariâ commodati, de ses dommages et intérêts.”

It is said by the plaintiff that this passage shows that the lender is bound to communicate to the borrower all that he has an interest in knowing with regard to the thing lent, and that he is liable if by gross negligence he does not find out a defect and inform the borrower. That passage, however, refers to communicating matters of which the lender is aware. This is shown by the earlier part of the same paragraph, and in an earlier paragraph (para. 80) it is distinctly so stated. Therefore, the gratuitous lender is liable only if he has kept back something which was known to him, either deliberately or through gross negligence.

Counsel for the plaintiff cited another passage from another French lawyer; but, though that may be the law of France, the law of this country does not go any further than was laid down in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (1). Counsel for the plaintiff also cited Moffatt v. Bateman (3) in the Privy Council. That case was, indeed, well decided; but it bears a false analogy to the present case. That was not the ordinary case of a gratuitous loan. It was a case like that of a carrier without reward: the bailee was to carry the bailor, and was bound not to be guilty of gross negligence. The duty in that case was that of the gratuitous bailee towards the bailor, and not the duty of the bailor to the bailee. Gross negligence is the standard by which to measure the duty of a gratuitous bailee towards the bailor. That is not, however, the standard by which to try the obligation of a gratuitous lender towards the borrower. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Auctioneer—Sale of land—Memorandum of contract—Need to be signed by auctioneer as agent for purchaser at time of sale—Inadequacy of signature of clerk.

In a sale by auction of freehold property the authority of the auctioneer to bind both parties by signing the memorandum on a copy of the particulars does not extend to the auctioneer's clerk, for the auctioneer as agent cannot delegate his authority. The memorandum, therefore, must be signed by the auctioneer himself at the same time of the sale, so as to constitute part of the transaction of sale.

The defendant, on entering a sale-room, had a conversation with the auctioneer and was asked to "give him a bid" for certain freehold property. In consequence of this request he bid for the property, but had no intention of actually purchasing it. When the property was knocked down to him he left the room, and, on being brought back, refused to sign the memorandum of agreement on a copy of the conditions of sale which had been drawn up by the auctioneer's clerk. A week later the auctioneer, at the instance of the vendor, filled up and signed his name as agent for the defendant on a memorandum on another copy of the conditions of sale. In an action brought by the plaintiffs for specific performance of the alleged contract,

Held: neither document was sufficient memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds as the first had been drawn up by the auctioneer's clerk, and the second was not signed by the auctioneer contemporaneously with the transaction of sale.

Notes. Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds (which imposed the need of a written memorandum before certain contracts could be enforced) has been largely repealed, but it still applies to a guarantee, and under s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 500), no action may be brought on a contract for the sale of land unless the agreement or memorandum thereof is in writing.

Action by vendors for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a freehold house.

The plaintiffs were the vendors of a freehold house known as The Riddings, 73, Tulse Hill. They caused this property to be put up for public auction by Messrs. Herring, Son and Daw, at the Mart, Tokenhouse Yard, on Nov. 25, 1895. The terms were expressed in the particulars and conditions of sale, at the end of which was the usual memorandum of agreement in blank, intended to be filled up by the purchaser and the auctioneer. The defendant, with a friend called Wyatt, attended the sale, which was conducted by Mr. Daw. As Mr. Daw entered the sale-room a conversation took place between him and the defendant, whom he knew personally, and just before he entered the rostrum he asked the defendant to "give him a bid." The sale then proceeded. It consisted of five properties, of which the house concerned was the third, and the reserve on that lot was fixed at £1,600. After

A some biddings the defendant bid £1,550, and after a short conversation between Mr. Daw and the vendors, the lot was knocked down to the defendant at that price. The sale of the two remaining properties was proceeded with, and at the close the defendant left the room. The auctioneer's clerk then mentioned to the auctioneer that the defendant had not signed the memorandum and a messenger was sent after him, and he returned. He was then asked to sign the memorandum but refused on the ground that he made the bid not on his own behalf but for Mr. Daw, and in compliance with the request made to him.

In the meantime the clerk had filled up the memorandum of agreement, on a copy of the conditions of sale, in the appropriate way. It ran thus :

C "I, George Balls, of Brixton Hill, S.W., do hereby acknowledge that I have this day purchased the property described in the within particulars of sale for the sum of £1,550, and having paid into the hands of Messrs. Herring, Son, and Daw, the auctioneers, the sum of £155 as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money, I hereby agree and bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay the balance of the said purchase money, and complete the said purchase in all respects according to the within conditions of sale. As witness my hand, this 25th day of November, 1895. [Then followed the account of the purchase money, the deposit and balance owing, and then] as agents for the vendors, Peter Bell and William Dickson, we hereby ratify this sale, and as auctioneers acknowledge . . ."

E The defendant refused to sign it, and Mr. Daw, the auctioneer, did not sign it. A week later, namely, on Dec. 2, Mr. Daw, at the instance of the vendors, filled up and signed his name as an agent of the defendant on a memorandum on another copy of the particulars. That memorandum was slightly altered, because no deposit was paid, but otherwise it was the same as before. On being presented with this memorandum the defendant still refused to complete the sale and the plaintiffs brought this action to compel him to do so, relying on the above-mentioned memoranda as being sufficient to satisfy s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. The defendant raised the defences that he entered into the contract under a mistake, and that there was no sufficient memorandum in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

G Mar. 10, 1897. STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued : The first question, which is one of fact, is, whether the defendant really bid for the property as he alleges, or, in other words, as a puffer at the sale. The story told by the defendant is somewhat strange; but having seen him in the box and heard the evidence of Mr. Wyatt, the defendant's friend, and seen the memoranda produced, I believe he did act under the belief which he professes; but that, on the other hand, there was no reasonable ground for his so acting, and what passed between him and Mr. Daw ought not to have misled him into that belief.

H The question then is, what is the legal result? It seems to me that, assuming a memorandum to exist which satisfies the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, there was a valid contract, and that the mistake does not affect the validity of the contract at law between the plaintiffs and defendant, and that at the utmost it constitutes a defence so far as the action seeks specific performance. Prior to the Judicature Acts there would have been an end of the matter; but, as the matter now stands, according to Tamplin v. James (3) the court is bound to go on and give the plaintiffs such relief as they are entitled to. Therefore it becomes necessary to consider the second defence, namely, that neither of these documents was sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

First, as to the auctioneer's clerk's memorandum, it is decided and established by a case to which I will refer later, that in a sale by auction the auctioneer has authority to bind both parties if he signs the memorandum on a copy of the particulars, and the question is, if that memorandum be filled up by a clerk, is that sufficient? An agent, however, cannot delegate his authority, and the law with reference to a clerk is thus stated by BLACKBURN, J., in Peirce v. Corf (1) (L.R. 9 Q.B. at pp. 214, 215) :

"I take it as quite clear that the auctioneer's clerk has no authority to sign by the general custom; although, as Bird v. Boulter (4) decided, there may be special circumstances to show that an auctioneer's clerk had authority to sign; where the bidder, that is the person to be charged, by word or sign authorises the auctioneer's clerk to sign on his behalf, he makes him his agent to sign, although by the general custom the auctioneer's clerk would not be the bidder's agent."

In the present case he did not sign, nor did he otherwise authorise the auctioneer's clerk to sign, and therefore the case of Bird v. Boulter (4), referred to by BLACKBURN, J., has no application.

It was urged, however, that the exigencies of the case require the clerk to be held authorised to sign the memorandum on behalf of the purchaser. The ordinary practice on a sale of real estate, as stated by Mr. Daw, appears to be for the auctioneer, after a lot is knocked down, to proceed with the sale, leaving the clerk to find out the name of the purchaser and to prepare the memorandum on two copies of the particulars, one for the signature of the purchaser and the other for that of the auctioneer. That there is some convenience in that practice there can be no doubt; but as to its validity it seems to me that the mere statement of it shows that there is no sufficient ground for alleging that the exigencies of the case require that the authority should be delegated. The practice contemplates that one part should be signed by the auctioneer, and if this be consistent with the requirements of business, it is difficult to see why the auctioneer himself should not sign the other. This appears to me an answer to the contention which was forcibly urged in argument. There can be no difficulty in writing his name down at the time on a copy of the particulars, and any way that has been held sufficient in several cases: see White v. Proctor (5); Bramley v. All (6); Kemcys v. Proctor (7). I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the memorandum filled in by the clerk is not sufficient to satisfy the statute.

Then is the memorandum sufficient which was signed by the auctioneer on Dec. 2? It is contended by the purchaser that, although the auctioneer signed it, yet he had no authority to do so, because the authority conferred at the time of the sale had expired long before that, and at all events could not be exercised at that date; and, secondly, that whatever authority was originally given had been actually revoked. In these circumstances it becomes necessary to consider the ground on which it was originally held that, on a sale by public auction of an interest in land or chattel subject to the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, the auctioneer is authorised to sign the memorandum. It was first established in the case of Emmerson v. Heelis (8), and LORD MANSFIELD, in giving his decision, says (2 Taunt. at pp. 47, 48) :

"Now this memorandum is more particular than most memorandums of sale are, and upon it the auctioneer writes down the purchaser's name. By what authority does he write down the purchaser's name? By the authority of the purchaser. These persons bid, and announce their biddings loudly and particularly enough to be heard by the auctioneer. For what purpose do they do this? That he may write down their names opposite to the lots; therefore he writes the name by the authority of the purchaser, and he is an agent for the purchaser; and it does seem, therefore, that this is a contract signed by an agent for the purchaser, and consequently is binding."

In the Earl of Glengal v. Barnard (9) LORD LANGDALE, M.R., thus explains the ground of that decision (1 Keen. at p. 788) :

“The nature of the proceeding by auction—the bidding for the purpose of making the purchase—the necessity of making a statement of the bidding—the direction to the auctioneer to write down the bidding, which is perhaps involved in the very process of bidding, and some other circumstances, afford intelligible ground for the decision in Emmerson v. Heelis (8), and the approbation which has since been bestowed upon it.”

These cases appear to me to show that the authority conferred on an auctioneer by a purchaser is to write down the bidding, and thus to make a minute or record of it at the time as part of the transaction. Such a record is held to be a memorandum sufficient to satisfy the statute. But I do not see anything which justifies him in making such a minute except at the time when the writing down of the name has been fairly held to be a part of the sale by auction. If the auctioneer were allowed to postpone putting down the name to a later time, evils might arise similar to those which the statute was intended to prevent. Such authority as he has appears to have been considered in several cases. The case of Mears v. Carr (10), relied on by the defendant, cannot, I think, be regarded as an authority, because there the lots were unsold, and the defendant in the case having called on the auctioneer and agreed to purchase certain lots the auctioneer entered the defendant's name in his presence in the catalogue. But all that did not take place until several days after.

The other point was raised in Buckmaster v. Harrop (2). There appears from the report (13 Ves. at p. 457) that the evidence of a memorandum in writing by the auctioneer did not show that he had made entries of the biddings at the time of the sale, and an objection was taken upon that ground by the residuary legatee. Two objections were in fact raised: one, that the memorandum was not made at the time; and the other, that the auctioneer had an interest. Dealing with that, the Lord Chancellor says (ibid. at pp. 473, 474):

“The only evidence that I can receive is the written memorandum itself, unless it is lost; and it must be a contemporary memorandum, especially in this case, as the auctioneer being himself the vendor, though only as a trustee, could not in strictness be the agent of the purchaser.”

The Lord Chancellor therefore says that the memorandum must be contemporary, so as to constitute part of the transaction of sale. If the auctioneer had proceeded to sign immediately after the conclusion of the sale, I should have been slow to hold that it was beyond his power; but the memorandum of Dec. 2, was signed at a time when the authority had ceased. It becomes, therefore, unnecessary to consider the question which was discussed, whether the purchaser could revoke the authority conferred on the auctioneer before he signed the memorandum. Without entering into a discussion of the cases cited, I will content myself with saying that I share with LORD ROMILLY the reluctance with which he held that upon a sale by auction under ordinary circumstances the vendor (or, as in the case before me, the purchaser) can say, after the lot has been knocked down to him, that he is not satisfied, and desires to withdraw his authority: see Day v. Wells (11). The result is, that the defence succeeds, and that the action must be dismissed with costs.

A limited company was incorporated in 1892 with a capital of £50,000 divided into 5,000 partly paid-up shares of £10 each. Both the memorandum and the articles of association authorised the creation of a charge on the uncalled capital of the company. In October, 1892, by a special resolution, it was declared that £5 remaining uncalled on the ordinary shares should not be capable of being called up "except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound-up." In June, 1894, the company issued 160 first mortgage debentures of £100 each charged on all its property, both present and future, including its "uncalled capital for the time being." In August, 1896, the company was compulsorily wound-up, at which time £5 remained uncalled on the ordinary shares, and subsequently the liquidator called up the uncalled capital. On the question whether the debentures were a first charge on the uncalled capital.

Held: the company having by special resolution provided a reserve of uncalled capital, that reserve was preserved for the general purposes of the company when wound-up; any application of that reserve towards repayment of the debentures would not be an application for the purposes of the company being wound-up; accordingly, the company had no authority to charge the debentures on the reserve uncalled capital and the reserve remained intact for the purposes of the winding-up.

B Appeal by H. H. Bartlett, the holder of a debenture issued by the Mayfair Property Co., and charging its uncalled capital, from a decision of WRIGHT, J. (see infra).

The company was formed and registered as a limited company on Aug. 16, 1892, with a nominal capital of £50,000 divided into 5,000 shares of £10 each. The memorandum of association stated that one of its objects was to borrow money and issue debentures charged on "the property and rights of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital." By the articles of association full power was given to the directors to issue debentures charging all the assets of the company, including its uncalled capital. Before this power was exercised a special resolution was passed on Oct. 12, 1892, whereby it was declared

D "That such portion of the company's capital as consists of £5 per share remaining uncalled upon all the ordinary shares of the company shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound-up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879."

E In June, 1894, it was resolved by the directors to create and issue debentures for £50,000 bearing interest at 6 per cent., and 160 debentures for £100 each bearing interest at 6 per cent. were created and issued accordingly under the seal of the company. By these debentures the company bound itself to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by them, and the company as beneficial owner charged with such payments "its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being."
F At the time these debentures were issued £4 5s. per share had been called up. There remained to be called up £5 15s. per share, of which, however, £5 could only be called up on the winding-up of the company.

G On Aug. 8, 1896, an action was brought against the company by a debenture holder suing on behalf of himself and all other debenture holders, and on Aug. 12, he obtained judgment in the usual form and a receiver was appointed. On the same day the company was ordered to be wound-up and a liquidator was appointed. By this time of the £5 15s. per share, uncalled up when the debentures were issued, 15s. had been called up by the directors; so that on Aug. 12, 1896, when the winding-up order was made, £5 per share had been called up by the directors and £5 more—i.e., the reserve capital—only remained to be called up for the purposes of the company being wound-up. The liquidator had called on the contributories for payment of this £5 per share. The assets of the company, including the reserve capital called up by the liquidator, were insufficient to pay the costs of the winding-up and the creditors of the company.

H In November, 1897, the plaintiff in the debenture holders' action applied by summons to determine the question whether the debentures created a valid first charge on the reserve capital so as to entitle the holders of them to payment out of that fund in priority to the other creditors and to the costs of the winding-up. WRIGHT, J., held against the plaintiff, that the company had no power to create any charge on that portion of its capital which by the Companies Act, 1879, could only be called up "in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound-up." From that decision the plaintiff appealed.

April 1, 1898. The following judgments were read.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts, referred to sections 4, 5, 6, 10, of the Companies Act, 1879, and continued: The contention on the part of the plaintiff is that a limited company can validly charge its uncalled capital if authorised so to do by its memorandum of association or by its articles; and that the capital or money which under the Act of 1879 can only be called up in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound-up is part of the capital of the company in the full and proper sense of that word; and that there being no prohibition against creating charges upon it the power to create such charges necessarily follows. This argument is based on Re Pyle Works (1), which finally settled that uncalled capital of a limited company governed by the Companies Act, 1862, could be validly charged in favour of particular persons. It is further contended that the payment of the secured debts of a company is as much a purpose of the company as the payment of its other debts; that there is no necessary implication requiring the court to hold reserve capital to be incapable of being charged with the payment of particular debts; and that it may be ruinous to a company to prevent it from obtaining relief from perhaps temporary pressure by raising money on the security of its most valuable asset.

Cogent as this argument is, I am convinced that it is unsound, and that to yield to it would defeat and not carry out the purpose with which the Act of 1879 was passed. When Re Pyle Works (1) was decided I foresaw that the decision might be pressed further than I was prepared to go, and I pointed out that, in my opinion, it did not authorise mortgages of reserve capital formed under the Act of 1879. I adhere to that view now that I have carefully re-considered it. In order properly to interpret any statute it is as necessary now as it was when LORD COKE reported Heydon's Case (2) to consider how the law stood when the statute to be construed was passed: what the mischief was for which the old law did not provide; and the remedy provided by the statute to cure that mischief. The Companies Act, 1879, was passed in order to remedy some defects in the law relating to unlimited companies, and which defects, although long known to lawyers, startled the public when the City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment in 1878. The members of unlimited companies were in this position: First, they were liable to calls on their shares to their nominal amounts. This was the only liability which could be enforced by the company or by its directors whilst the company was carrying on business. This liability, but no liability beyond, was an asset of the company with which the company could deal. But, secondly, in addition to this limited liability the members were under an unlimited liability to the creditors of the company; and this unlimited liability could be enforced by creditors, although it was not an asset of the company which the company or its directors could charge, alien, or dispose of in any way whatever to the prejudice of any creditor. What was wanted was power to form a company with a reserve capital which should be limited in amount, which should be available for creditors in the event of a winding-up, and which should not be under the control of the directors any more than the funds were which the creditors could obtain, but the directors could not under the old law. This amendment in the law was made by the Act of 1879.

It appears to me plain that s. 5 was framed with a double object—viz., first, to preserve for the general creditors of the company the funds which the members were liable to pay, but which the directors could not call up; and, secondly, to enable the members to limit the amount of their liability on a winding-up to pay the creditors more than the amount preserved for them. If the plaintiff's contention is right, the first of these objects will be entirely defeated, although there is not a sign of any intention on the part of the legislature to effect so great a change in the law, and although such a change would or might be ruinous to the great body of a company's creditors and be destructive of the credit which the preservation intact of reserve capital gives to those companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879. To effect such a change in the law applicable to unlimited companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879 some provision is wanted to confer on companies carrying on business power to deal with what the members are only liable to pay when the winding-up takes place. Such a power would be a complete novelty and cannot be inferred from the absence of any words prohibiting it.

I have dwelt on the effect of the Act of 1879 on unlimited companies, which take the benefit of it because the effect on them and the effect on limited companies are to be gathered from the use of exactly similar language. It was obviously desirable to enable companies originally formed and registered as limited companies to have reserve capital and not to confine that advantage to unlimited companies registering themselves as limited companies. The object of the last part of the section is exactly the same as the object of the first part. Both classes of companies are put on the same footing so far as reserve capital is concerned. The prohibition against calling up the reserve capital in the case of limited companies is inserted for precisely the same purpose as in the case of unlimited companies viz., to preserve such capital for the general purposes of the company when wound-up. To interpret the section so as to enable a company to defeat this object by pledging or otherwise disposing of its reserve capital is, in my opinion, entirely to miss the real meaning of the legislature as expressed in the language it has used. Neither the Act of 1879 nor the other Companies Acts give a company power to dispose of assets which cannot come into existence until it is wound-up. To hand over the reserve capital or any part of it when called up to a prior assignee, or to a mortgagee who has no claim against the assets until he has realised or given up his security, is not to apply the reserve capital for the purposes of the company being wound-up within the true meaning of that expression as used in s. 5, but to prevent such application. This was the view of WRIGHT, J., and it is mine also.

With respect to Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Co.'s Debenture-Holders (3), on which counsel for the plaintiff so much relied, I need only observe that it was not a decision on the Act of 1879, but a decision on an article of association, so worded as not to preserve, nor indeed to show any intention to preserve, the reserve capital for the benefit of the general creditors in the event of liquidation. I cannot regard that case as an authority against the view which I take of the Act of 1879. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I concur.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree; but I prefer to express my own reasons. The question in this case is whether capital rendered incapable by the Act of 1879 of being called up, except in the event and for the purposes of a winding-up, can be mortgaged by the directors. It is not an essential characteristic of capital of companies formed under the Companies Act, 1862, that it should be capable of being mortgaged by the company. All that was decided in Re Pyle Works (1) was that, there being in the articles of that company a power of mortgage wide enough to include uncalled capital, there was nothing in the nature of uncalled capital as constituted by the Companies Act, 1862, to prohibit, either by express words or by necessary implication, the mortgaging of such capital, and that the article, therefore, was operative and not ultra vires. The question, therefore, in this case, is not whether capital rendered incapable of being called up by the Act of 1879 is capital within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, but whether being such capital there is anything in the Act of 1879 which expressly or by necessary implication renders such capital incapable of being mortgaged. This question depends on the true construction of the words of the Act. [His Lordship read s. 4 of the Act of 1879, and continued:]

It will be observed that this section, excepting in so far as it provides that the registration of an “unlimited company” as a “limited company” in pursuance of this Act shall not affect or prejudice any debts or liabilities incurred prior to registration, does not impose any condition of registration. Then comes s. 5, which enacts: [His LORDSHIP read s. 5, and continued:] The first three paragraphs of A this section relate solely to "unlimited companies" registering as "limited companies." The first paragraph provides that the "unlimited company" may by the resolution assenting to registration increase the nominal amount of its capital by increasing the nominal amount of each of its shares, and the second paragraph provides that no part of such increased capital shall be capable of being called up, except in the event of, and for the purposes of, the company being wound-up. The third B paragraph provides, that in cases where no such increase of nominal capital may be resolved upon an "unlimited company" by the resolution assenting to registration as a "limited company" may provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound-up. It will be observed that the condition in para. 2 is a condition of the increase of capital, and not a condition of registration as a "limited company." C The statutory condition is of course irrevocable, and the resolution to the same effect in para. 3 seems equally irrevocable, as being a condition of the constitution of the company as a "limited company."

If one may speculate on the intention of the legislature in creating this condition of the increase of its nominal capital on the registration of an "unlimited company" as a "limited company," and in empowering the "unlimited company" on registration as a "limited company" to provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall be subject to a similar condition to that contained in the proviso, it would seem to be that, whereas the "unlimited company" while it existed as such afforded to its creditors, in the unlimited liability of its members, a fund for the satisfaction of their claims, outside and beyond the nominal amount of its capital, as defined by the nominal amount of each of its shares, which fund was not available for the company in the conduct of its business, or in any way at the disposal of the company, the legislature seems to have intended to empower the company as a "limited company" to appropriate a portion of its capital to the creation of a fund which should be limited to the same purposes, viz., which, while available for the satisfaction of creditors, should not be available for the company in the conduct of its business, or in any way at the disposal of the company. I do not think, however, that the legislature, by the provisions in these paragraphs, had in view the protection or security of the creditors. If the legislature had so intended, it would have made the appropriation of a portion of the capital to such a purpose a condition of registration under this Act. I think the view of the legislature was to enable the company on registration to improve its credit, by affording to its creditors to a limited extent a security somewhat of the character which the company, whilst unlimited, afforded to them. E F G

The primary object of the Act of 1879 being to enable an "unlimited company" to convert itself into a "limited company," and the legislature having thought fit to enable the "unlimited company," at the time of its conversion, to maintain or improve its credit by the appropriation of a portion of its capital as a reserve of this character, the legislature seems to mean, by s. 5, to extend this power or privilege to companies which were originally registered as "limited companies" under the Act of 1862. The fourth paragraph of the section runs thus: [His LORDSHIP read para. 4, and continued:] It will be observed that the final words of this paragraph give a statutory effect to the resolution when passed. The effect of this would seem to be to make the resolution irrevocable. Apart from this section, I doubt whether a resolution providing that a portion of the capital of a "limited company" should not be capable of being called up except in the event of, and for the purposes of the company being wound-up, could have been effectively passed by the company, even in the shape of a resolution altering the articles, unless the memorandum of association in general or specific terms authorised the passing of such a resolution; but I gather from the observations of LORD HERSCHELL, in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (4), that such a resolution might validly be passed if authorised generally or specifically by the "memorandum of association." It may be that such H I a resolution passed independently of the memorandum of association and independently of the statute, would have been revocable except so far as acted on, and would have merely limited the control of the company over this portion of the capital in respect of "calls," and would have left the power of mortgaging untouched; but the effect of a resolution passed under the memorandum of association or the statute is certainly to render the resolution irrevocable.

Supposing such a clause to have been validly introduced into the memorandum of association, what would have been the effect of such a clause in the memorandum on this portion of the capital? I am not speaking here of its effect as an alteration of the memorandum or constitution of the company, authorised by this Act, because in such case its effect would undoubtedly, to my mind, be the same as the effect of the identical resolution authorised in this section, if passed by an unlimited company at the time of its conversion by this Act into a "limited company." I am speaking of its effect as a valid clause in the memorandum of association, if such there could be, independently of some statute outside the Act of 1862. Would not the effect of such a clause by necessary implication be to withdraw the portion of the capital of the company affected by it from the control of the company as a "going concern," and to convert it into a fund applicable only to the payment of debts in the event of a winding-up? I think it would have this effect by negating qua this portion of the capital the implication of a power to mortgage, just as KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ., held in Stanley's Case (5) that the necessary discretion of the directors from time to time to make calls negated the implication of a power to mortgage or assign uncalled capital. It is true that the inference of the lords justices must be taken to be overruled by Re Pyle Works (1), but the principle that you may negative such implication by an intent drawn from the terms of the memorandum is not overruled.

I agree with the contention of the plaintiff that the payment of secured creditors is a purpose of the winding-up, and I agree that this portion of capital is an asset of the company which has to be collected by the liquidator—but neither of these propositions seems to me to negative the appropriation of this portion of the assets to the exclusive purpose of the payment of debts, or at all events the appropriation of this portion of the assets to purposes exclusive of sale or mortgage. It must be remembered that the Act of 1862 contains no express power to a company to sell or mortgage the whole or any part of its property, and that you must look at the memorandum of association to find whether there is by implication a power of sale or mortgage of its property, and what part of its property, and whether there is any prohibition, express or implied, contained in it prohibiting sales or mortgages of the whole or any part of its property. And I think that a clause in the memorandum negating the power to call up a portion of the capital except for the purpose of winding-up would by implication negative the power of the company to sell or mortgage such portion. At all events, whatever may be the effect of a resolution passed independently of this statute, I think that a statutory resolution, passed under s. 5 of this Act, by implication negatives the implied power to mortgage the portion of capital affected by it, which would otherwise be inferred in respect of every portion of the capital of the company, and renders invalid, pro tanto, any mortgaging power given by the articles.

I wish to add that, in Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Co.'s Debenture-Holders (3), the articles did not render the capital incapable of being called up except for the purpose of winding-up, but only unless a special resolution was passed by the company, to the effect that the paid-up capital of the company had become insufficient to meet its liabilities, and that it was therefore necessary to call up the balance of the shares. This article obviously left the whole capital at the disposal of the company.

(ii) If not, with what duty the instrument was chargeable? G

The instrument was as follows:

"I, Alfred Kaye, in exchange for eight fully-paid ordinary shares of J. and P. Coats, Ltd., allotted to me by them, do hereby transfer to the said J. and P. Coats, Ltd., twenty-five ordinary shares of £10 each, of and in the undertaking called James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd. To hold unto the said J. and P. Coats, Ltd., do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid." H

The appellant company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-1890 on Aug. 6, 1890, with a capital of £3,750,000 divided into 175,000 ordinary and 200,000 preference shares of £10 each, for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of cotton, woollen, and other threads; and James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., was incorporated under the same Acts on Nov. 27, 1891, with a capital of £500,000 divided into 25,000 ordinary and 25,000 preference shares of £10 each, for the purpose of carrying on a business of a precisely similar character. Negotiations had I

1 taken place between James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., and the appellant company, for the acquisition by the appellant company of the shares of James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., or of all its undertakings and property. An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders in James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., was held on July 20, 1896, when it was resolved that the amalgamation with the appellant company
2 be carried out and that it be effected by an exchange of the preference and ordinary shares in James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., for fully paid-up preference and ordinary shares in the appellant company. A memorandum was prepared for signature by the shareholders in James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., by which those who signed agreed with J. and P. Coats, Ltd., to transfer to them all their preference and ordinary shares in James Chadwick & Brother, Ltd., in exchange for fully-paid preference and ordinary shares of J. and P. Coats, Ltd., in certain proportions. A 3 memorandum was signed by Alfred Kaye and accepted for and on behalf of J. and P.
Coats, Ltd. Subsequently Alfred Kaye executed an instrument "in exchange for" fully-paid ordinary shares in the appellant company. The commissioners were of the opinion that the instrument was a transfer made upon a sale to be charged under the head "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" with ad valorem duty. On a Case Stated by the Commissioners the Divisional Court gave judgment for the

Here it must be admitted, and is admitted, that there is a conveyance by a person of his property which consists of shares in a company. We have to apply to that transaction that which was said by LINDLEY, L.J., in John Foster & Sons v. I.R.
Comrs. (1). The person who conveys in the present case, is Mr. Kaye. In Foster's
F Case (1), LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1894] 1 Q.B. at p. 528):

"Now, what is the consideration? The consideration for the transfer of this property is, I agree, not money, but it is stocks and securities, which for this purpose are to be regarded as equivalent to money by reason of s. 71 of the [Stamp Act, 1870]."

G That is the case here, reading s. 55 of the Act of 1891 for s. 71 of the Act of 1870.
That is the construction of the Act adopted by LINDLEY, L.J., that if a person conveys property for a consideration and that consideration is shares, it is equivalent to a conveyance of the property for money, and is a conveyance on sale. Then again, in that case, KAY, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 531):

H "It seems to me clearly to be a sale for a consideration which, if not money, at least is money's worth";

and A. L. SMITH, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 531):

I "Section 70 enacts that the term conveyance on sale includes every instrument whereby any property, upon the sale thereof, is transferred to or vested in the purchaser. Then s. 71 implies that it may be in consideration of any stock or marketable security."

The transaction in the present case can be described exactly in the language used in the above case. It has, however, been attempted to make an instrument which will not come within the language of that case. The consideration has been stated before the words of conveyance, and the words used are "in exchange for"; but if for those words are substituted the words "in consideration of," there is the exact transaction described in that case, and the latter words are those which ought properly to be used in this transaction. It is also really the same as the transaction described in Great Western Rail. Co. v. I.R. Comrs. (2), which preceded Foster's Case (1). It seems to me that the present case is exactly within the decision in Foster's Case (1), and that this is nothing but an artful attempt to conceal the real transaction by using the words "in exchange" instead of "in consideration," in order to try and get out of the rules laid down in those two cases. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the Divisional Court was perfectly right, and this appeal must be dismissed. B

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether this document was a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891. The Stamp Act, 1891, by s. 54 and s. 55, gives a definition of what shall be included in the term "conveyance on sale." That question has been already dealt with in John Foster & Sons v. I.R. Comrs. (1) and Great Western Rail. Co. v. I.R. Comrs. (2). I think that this case comes within the definition contained in s. 54 and s. 55, as explained by LINDLEY, L.J., in Foster's Case (1). In considering this document we must see what is the real substance of the transaction, and the mere fact that the words "in exchange for" are used cannot alter the substance of the transaction. In my opinion this transaction is in substance a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Act. It is contended that it is not a conveyance on sale, but an exchange within s. 73 and the schedule to the Act. As to the schedule, if this is a conveyance on sale, as I hold it to be, then it cannot be an exchange. Section 73 clearly does not apply to a case like this; it applies only to an exchange, partition, or division of real property. The contention of the appellants can, therefore, only be founded upon the words in the schedule—"Exchange or Excambion—Instruments effecting. In the case specified in s. 73, see that section. In any other case, 10s." It is not necessary now to decide to what those words "in any other case" do apply. They do not apply to the present case. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed. D

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of opinion that this case is one of "conveyance on sale." Looking at the document in question we find that it is an undoubted transfer to J. and P. Coats, Ltd., of shares in an undertaking called Chadwick & Brother, Ltd. So far, it is without doubt a transfer; that is, a conveyance of these shares within the meaning of the Act. The consideration is certain shares of J. and P. Coats, Ltd. Instead, however, of saying "in consideration of," they ingeniously say "in exchange for." Suppose those words "in exchange" were left out altogether, and the words were "for fully-paid shares in," nobody would ever have suggested that it was not a conveyance on sale. Using those particular words cannot make any difference. By the use of particular words the nature of the transaction cannot be altered. If we look at what led up to this transaction, we see that the shareholders were asked to sell their shares, and the whole bargain went upon a sale of these shares to J. and P. Coats, Ltd. The meetings of the company were called to sanction a scheme for the sale of those shares, and this was a sale of those shares. The transaction is in substance a sale, and nothing else. If this were not so, every transfer of property for property would be an exchange, but that would be contrary to the provisions of s. 54 and s. 55. It has been ingeniously argued that it is an exchange if the transfer is of property of the same kind on each side; but I find nothing in the Act to support that argument. Whatever may be the meaning of the words in the schedule as to exchange "in any other case," I will not now say anything about that, except that this transaction is not an exchange, but is a conveyance on sale. The appeal fails and must be dismissed. F

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE CORPORATION

In an action for a declaration the Crown claimed to be entitled to part of the foreshore and river bed within the limits of a port. The defendants, the conservators of the river, claimed the ownership of the whole of that foreshore and river bed. On the question of what documents, if any, the defendants were bound to disclose,

Held: (i) the Crown had the same right of discovery against a subject as one subject had against another; (ii) the Crown was entitled to the discovery, not only of documents relating to the parts claimed by the Crown, but also of all documents relating to acts of ownership by the defendants within the limits of the port, including their acts as conservators, as they might repel the defendants' claim.

Dictum of PARKE, B., in Jones v. Williams (1) (1837), 2 M. & W. at p. 331, applied.

Notes. Under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 28, the Crown may now be required to make discovery of documents, produce documents for inspection and answer interrogatories in civil proceedings to which it is a party, but this is without prejudice to its right to resist discovery on the ground that disclosure of a document or the answering of a question would be injurious to the public interest.

The provisions as to discovery and inspection are now contained in R.S.C. Ord. 31.

One of the points raised in the Appeal was that the court had no jurisdiction to order discovery because no exception had been taken by the Crown to the answers to the interrogatories within six weeks, as it was alleged was necessary under the Rules of Easter Terms, 1866. This argument was rejected, and the case is not here reported on this point.

Interlocutory Appeal by the defendants from an order of WILLS, J., by which he ordered the town clerk of Newcastle to make a further affidavit of documents in these proceedings.

The proceedings were commenced in March, 1892, by way of information, the Attorney-General claiming a declaration that the foreshore and bed to mid-stream of the river Tyne on the south side opposite the manors of Gateshead and Wickham were vested in the Crown. The defendant corporation by their answer claimed the whole of the foreshore and bed of the river Tyne within the limits of the port of Newcastle, which included the part claimed by the Crown. The defendants had from early times been conservators of the river. Interrogatories were delivered by the informant, and in their answer the defendants set out in a schedule a long list of charters, documents, and entries in books relating to the matters in question, and alleged they had no other relevant documents. They declined to produce the books themselves for inspection or any documents except those relating to the manors of Gateshead and Wickham. The defendants relied on acts of ownership, but refused to show any documents which related to their acts as conservators of the river Tyne. The informant did not take exception to the answer, but moved for liberty to inspect the documents and books in the defendants' possession which contained entries relating to the acts of the defendants with reference to the river Tyne, on the ground that they had no title to the foreshore at all, and that all their acts had been done as conservators and not as owners; and he contended that the defendants having set up a title to the whole foreshore as a defence, as he had established a right to discovery as to a part of it, he was entitled to discovery as to the whole, and as to their acts as conservators. The motion came before WILLS, J., who ordered the defendant Mr. Hill Motum, the town clerk of Newcastle, who had been made a party for the purposes of discovery, to make a further affidavit of documents, and this was an appeal from that decision.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the order of the learned judge in the court below ought to be maintained. The order is this :

"It is ordered that the defendant Hill Motum do within twenty-eight days from the date of this order make and file a full and sufficient affidavit stating what documents relating to the matters in question in this cause the defendant corporation have or have had in their possession or power and accounting for the same, and as to any document or entry which the defendants may object to produce stating the facts on which the defendants rely to show that the informant is not entitled to inspect the same."

In my opinion that was as lenient an order as the learned judge in the circumstances of the case could make. Among other things it was urged that the defendants had a grievance, because, while on the one hand discovery could not be compelled from the Crown, the subject was bound to discover. That grievance was entirely removed by what was said by the Attorney-General, who stated at once that he should afford the same discovery in this case as a subject would be entitled to in a suit between subject and subject.

But then a point arises with regard to the merits. The defendants contend that all that is claimed by the information is the foreshore to two manors, and therefore all that they can be called upon to discover is documents and acts of ownership relating to those two manors; and if they have any other documents, or if there are any other acts of ownership which relate to other portions of the river Tyne, they cannot be called upon to discover them. I think the defendants have acted on a wrong principle. Directly the unum quid is shown as it is in this case (I mean

A by unum quid a stream or common, whichever it may be), other acts of ownership on other parts of the common or of the river, as the case may be, are admissible as evidence and subject-matter of discovery by the opposite party, because they are acts which more or less may, and very often do, go to repel the title which is set up by the defendant.

B It is most material in this case to bear in mind what the defendants claim. They claim in their answer the foreshore of the whole of the port of the river Tyne. They also are conservators of the river Tyne.

C What the Crown desires to have discovered is any documents or acts of ownership which relate to other parts of the river Tyne outside the foreshore of those two manors, and also any acts of ownership or documents which have anything to do with their position as conservators of the river Tyne. It appears to me that they are clearly entitled to discovery of such matters. The case was very well put, if I may say so, by PARKE, B., in Jones v. Williams (1), where he says (2 M. & W. at p. 331):

D "Evidence may be given of acts done on other parts, provided there is such a common character of locality between those parts and the spot in question as would raise a reasonable inference in the minds of the jury that the place in dispute belonged to the plaintiff if the other parts did."

I think that is applicable to the present case.

E With regard to anything done by the defendants as conservators, it appears to me that there may be acts and documents relating to them as conservators which it may be most material for the Crown to have discovery of for the purposes of determining what the nature of those acts or the character of those documents may be. I mean by that whether they are acts referable to their agency as conservators, or whether they are referable to their being the owners of the soil. There are acts which may be done by conservators, such as (taking a case which was put to us by the Attorney-General) the erection of a pier or the creation of an obstruction in a river, which might, if they were not conservators, be a most formidable act of ownership, but which might be qualified or accounted for, so as not to be of any value as proving ownership of the soil if those same things were done by the defendants in their character of conservators.

F I think, therefore, it is most material that discovery should be made of those matters. In my opinion the order of WILLS, J., is perfectly right, and I think the Crown are entitled to see all such documents as I have alluded to which repel the defence which has been set up by the defendants. I mean documents which have anything to do with the soil of the bed of the river. I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

G
H RIGBY L.J.— I am of the same opinion. In this case no doubt the Crown is claiming only the foreshore opposite to the manors on the south side of the river, that is the right bank, I presume, usque ad medium filum. But the defence set up by the corporation is, that they are the owners of the whole bed of the river from one end of the port to the other. If they are, the Crown cannot be owner of this part and must fail. Their defence is, that they are owners of the whole, including this part; that they are owners of this part because they are owners of the whole; and if they cannot make out that they are owners of the whole they cannot make out that they are therefore, as owners of the whole, owners of this part.

I What is the right on general principles of a plaintiff or of an informant in cases of this sort? It makes no difference practically which it is. He has a right to discovery of everything that will make out his case, no one doubts that. But he has a right to a great deal more. He has a right to discovery of everything that will make out, or tend to make out, that the defence set up is not a good defence. In other words, in this case he has a right to discovery of anything which will or may tend to show that the defendants have not the absolute ownership of the whole bed of the river within the limits of the port, A which includes those manors in question.

When we consider discovery from that point of view, it does not in the least matter whether these acts of ownership are on this particular part of the river. The informant can say, "You have not got that title which you set up as your defence," and it appears to me, both upon principle and upon authority, that the Crown is entitled to have discovery of every act of ownership which was exercised, in B order that the Crown may see under what circumstances those acts of ownership were exercised, and may have the opportunity of investigating whether they do not contain elements which will go to defeat the title to the whole bed of the river, which is the defence that is set up.

As regards the conservators, they are in that sense, I suppose, the agents of the Crown. They act under a charter, or something of the sort; and it may very C well be, as is pointed out by my brother LOPES, that they do a great many things as conservators which would be utterly unjustifiable if they were not conservators, and yet which conservators might do although they were not owners. I think it is very important indeed that the informant should have the opportunity of distinguishing what acts those were, and saying, "I cannot take the opinion, D however honest, however well supported by other legal opinions, of gentlemen who represent the corporation in this case; but, from the nature of the case, the informant ought to be able to see what the matter is in order to judge for himself."

I think that covers the whole ground, but I will say a word on one or two other matters. On the question of hardship, all that the court has to do is to investigate the state of the law; and if, for some reason known to the Crown, it had been against the public interest in this case to produce documents, even then E I should say I cannot help it—I have to administer the law. The law is that the Crown is entitled to full discovery, and that the subject as against the Crown is not.
That is a prerogative of the Crown, part of the law of England, and we must administer it as we find it. I may say that in these days the prerogative of the Crown is about equivalent to the rights of the public, and, therefore, there is F nothing so very hard in it; but in this case, as we have heard, no attempt has been made to depart from the practice that, to my knowledge, has existed for many years past. There has always been the utmost care to give a defendant that discovery which the Crown would have been compelled to give if in the position of a subject, unless there be some plain overruling principle of public interest concerned which cannot be disregarded. I think the order appealed from is G perfectly right.

UNIVERSAL STOCK EXCHANGE, LTD. v. STRACHAN

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Morris), March 19, 20, 1896]

*Gaming—Gambling transaction—Stock Exchange—Contract for “differences”
—No intention to deliver or take up stock—Recovery of deposited securities—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 109), s. 18.*

A transaction is only a gambling one if both parties to it so intend. Thus, if a person directs a broker to buy stock, this does not become a gambling transaction merely because the purchaser intends to sell again before the settling day arrives. If, however, there is a secret understanding that the stock should never be called for or delivered and that only differences should be dealt with, the agreement is null and void under the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, and this is so even though the contract may expressly provide that it is not a gambling transaction, and that either party may require the completion of the purchase. Property deposited as security for the payment of such differences is not deposited to “abide the event of a wager” within that section, and may be recovered by action.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.J.J.), reported [1895] 2 Q.B. 329, dismissing an application to set aside the verdict of the jury, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover certain securities which the former had deposited with the latter as "cover" in respect of certain speculative transactions on the Stock Exchange. A

The plaintiff bought from and sold to the defendants various stocks and shares in 1893 and 1894, the sales being subject to various "terms of business." These provided that all bargains were to be completed on the next settling day unless the defendants agreed to a postponement at the plaintiff's request; that the defendants were to receive interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the purchase money of all stocks B from the date of purchase until completion; that the defendants were to have a lien upon certain of the plaintiff's property for the due performance of the contract; and that the contract was not one of gaming or wagering. The transactions were for very large amounts, but in no case were any stocks or shares delivered. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the securities deposited by him, which the defendants claimed to retain for the balance which they alleged was due to them as a result of C the transactions in question. The plaintiff alleged that the transactions in question were gambling transactions, and at the trial, before CAVE, J., and a special jury, the jury found in his favour, being of opinion that the whole of the transactions in question were gambling transactions, and that he was entitled to have all the securities deposited by him with the defendants returned to him. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal on the grounds that the jury had been misdirected, D and also that there was no evidence to go to the jury. Their appeal was dismissed, and they thereupon appealed to this House.

By the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18 (as amended by the Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1) :

"All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and . . . no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made. . . ." E

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Pollard for the appellants.

Bigham, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the respondent, were not called on to argue. F

LORD HALSBURY, L.C. This case comes before your Lordships under circumstances which render it unnecessary to deal with it very elaborately, or as if it established any very important principle of law. The question of law intended to be argued originally was, whether CAVE, J., misdirected the jury. He said at the beginning of his summing-up : G

"The question which you have to try is, whether these transactions were real bargains for purchase of stock, or whether they were simply gambling transactions intended to end in the payment of differences. . . . I have no doubt that most, if not all, of you are perfectly familiar with transactions on the Stock Exchange, but I may make use of that as an illustration of my meaning. A man goes to a broker and directs him to buy or sell so much stock, as the case may be. That may be in the eye of the purchaser a gambling transaction, or it may not. If he means to invest his money in the purchase of the stock which he orders to be bought, that undoubtedly is a perfectly legitimate and real business transaction. If he does not mean to take up his stock, if he means to sell again before the settling day arrives, that may be a gambling transaction so far as he is concerned; but it is not necessarily a gambling transaction so far as the broker is concerned; and in order to be a gambling transaction, such as the law points at, it must be a gambling transaction in the intention of both the parties to it. . . . Notwithstanding the ostensible 'terms of business,' was there a secret understanding that the stock should never be called for or delivered, and that differences only should be dealt with? If there was that secret understanding, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover his securities. If there was not that secret understanding, he is not entitled to recover them, and that is the only question with which I need trouble you." H I

A I am wholly unable to understand, after that direction to the jury, what possible misdirection could have been suggested. That was a most accurate direction to the jury of what they were to find upon the facts before them; and, although there is a direction at the close of his summing-up to the jury which, I think, it is possible might have been objected to on the other side as being too favourable to the appellants, yet, so far as the appellants are concerned, it seems to me that it is impossible
B to say that the learned judge did not put before the jury the true question which they had to determine.

Therefore, the case resolves itself into an entirely different question, the only question of law to which I need refer, namely, whether or not there was any evidence to go to the jury. I cannot doubt that there was a very considerable amount of evidence to go to the jury, and I agree with the courts below in saying that one
C does not adequately discuss that question by taking each part of the case by itself, or dissecting the case, and disposing of this or that piece of the evidence as if it were to be looked at alone. The whole transaction has to be looked at, and the whole nature of this institution, whatever it is.

Speaking now upon the evidence before us, it appears to me as if it were a concern expressly designed for the purpose of enabling people to gamble in such a way
D as to evade the provisions of the law. It may or may not be that, it is not necessary to decide whether it is or not, it is not before us at this moment, but I say now, as justifying the finding of the jury, that that is what it seems to me to be, looking at the whole nature of the agreement. When I say "the agreement" I mean the "terms of business" which they call upon a customer to sign, which are to constitute the contractual relations between the parties. I will not rely too much upon the
E circumstances of suspicion in it, namely, that they say that it is not to be a gambling transaction, but that it is to be a real bona fide transaction. When I look at the terms themselves the whole scheme seems to me to be intended with great ingenuity to pretend that this is to be a real transaction, and yet there is to be a payment in respect of the relations between the parties which is only reconcilable in my mind with its being an unreal transaction. They are to get 5 per cent. Each of the F learned counsel in turn has been asked what that was for, inasmuch as it was admitted that there was no purchase and no sale. In all these transactions not one single purchase or sale is proved to have existed during the whole period in which this business was going on. Then if the real meaning of the parties is this, that there is to be only a payment of differences, what is it but a gaming and wagering transaction between the two as to what shall be the payment on the one side or on the G other side? If I were on the jury I should come to that conclusion; but I am not under the necessity of trying this question as if I were upon the jury, because the jury have found that it was a gambling transaction upon evidence which seems to me extremely satisfactory.

The only question for your Lordships is whether there was evidence to go to the jury, because, under the circumstances of this case, it would be idle to contend that,
I if there was evidence to go to the jury, this is a case in which your Lordships would say that the case should be tried again by another jury. I am satisfied, as far as I am concerned, that the jury were right, and that there was ample evidence to go to them which would justify them in the conclusion at which they arrived. I, therefore, move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. So long as the finding of the jury that it was a gambling transaction stands, it is impossible for the appellants to object to the judgment against them which has been pronounced. They say that the finding ought not to stand: that either there ought to be a new trial because the learned judge misdirected the jury, or because the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or that the verdict ought to be entered for them because there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the respondent's case.

As to misdirection I can see none. The learned judge appears to have laid down the law certainly not too favourably for the plaintiff. With regard to the verdict being against the weight of evidence, the learned judge who tried this case, and the Court of Appeal, have been satisfied with the verdict of the jury, and under those circumstances it would need a very overwhelming case to induce your Lordships to interfere. So far from there being any such case, the verdict is one of which, in my opinion, no complaint can properly be made. A

It remains to consider whether there was evidence to go to the jury. The case on behalf of the appellants is this: that when you look at the documents which contain the contract between the parties you see that these were not upon the face of them gaming contracts, but, on the contrary, appeared not to be gaming contracts, that there was no evidence of anything passing between the respondent and the appellants to the effect that the real transaction should not be such as they represented, and consequently that there was no evidence to go to the jury. I cannot accept that view. I think that the character of the documents themselves, coupled with the nature of the transactions entered into, the position of the parties who entered into them, and other circumstances which I need not detail, raised a question for the jury whether they were real transactions of commerce, or whether they were a mere gambling for differences. I think that it is impossible to say that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the point. B C D

It has been said that whenever a contract is entered into between two parties containing an obligation under any circumstances to cause property to pass from one to another, whatever else there may be in the contract, and although neither of the parties contemplated that that provision would ever become operative, yet, if it ever may become operative, the contract cannot be by way of gaming and wagering. The proposition amounts to this, that parties who intended to gamble with one another, but wanted to have the security against one another of being able in a court of justice to recover their bets, could compel a court of justice to adjudicate and secure to them their bets by a judgment, if only they inserted in their contract a provision which might in a certain event become operative to compel the goods to be delivered and received, although neither of them anticipated such a contingency; the purpose of inserting the provision creating an obligation being only to cloak the fact that it was a gambling transaction, and to enable them to sue one another for gambling debts. The proposition contended for by the learned counsel for the appellants would really lead to that result, and I should require much consideration before I gave my assent to a proposition involving such consequences. E F G

I ought to observe upon one other point, though probably it was sufficiently disposed of in the course of the argument. It is said that although it may be a gambling contract, yet nevertheless the very provisions of the section against gaming and wagering prevent the plaintiff from recovering the security which he deposited with the defendants, inasmuch as it is an "article of value" deposited with them to "abide the event" of a wager. That seems to me not to be the case. It was deposited as security against a debt which might arise from a gambling transaction. What the appellants are really seeking is to avail themselves of that security by virtue of a void contract, and it is impossible to say that it is an "article of value" deposited with the defendants to abide the event of a wager. That was not really the nature of the transaction at all. H I

Without any pressure from his co-trustees or the beneficiaries, two days before his bankruptcy a bankrupt, who had committed breaches of trust, conveyed an estate on trust to make good the breaches of trust.

Held: the deed was not a fraudulent preference within s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, because the object of the bankrupt in executing it was not to prefer some creditors to others, but to shield himself from the consequences of his breaches of trust.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and CHITTY, L.JJ.), reported sub nom. New, Prance and Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting, [1897] 2 Q.B. 19, affirming a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., at the trial before him without a jury. C

Courtenay Connell Prance, a partner in the firm of Messrs. New, Prance and Garrard, solicitors, of Evesham, and a trustee of a number of estates, had committed breaches of trust by paying trust funds into the firm's general banking account instead of investing them. In November, 1893, New, the senior partner, died insolvent and the business was carried on by Prance and Garrard. By a deed dated Mar. 29, 1894, which was recited that Prance was the owner of the Longdon Hill Estate of about 89 acres in Worcestershire, yielding about £414 a year, and subject to mortgages amounting to £6,400, that he was the active trustee of certain scheduled estates and the breaches of trust committed by him, Prance conveyed to one William Hunting, a clerk in the firm, the Longdon Hill Estate in fee simple as trustee, subject to the mortgages, on trust to raise by way of sale or mortgage the sums mentioned in the deed, and to pay them to the trustees of the scheduled trust estates to be held by them on the trusts declared by the instruments of which they were the trustees; and the deed declared that if the moneys ultimately required for rectification and completely satisfying the recited breaches of trust should be less than the sum of £4,200, the difference between the moneys received by the trustee and that which should be actually required for the rectification of the trust estates should be held by the trustee in trust for Prance. Prance also instructed a clerk to put certain parcels of share certificates in the boxes containing the securities and papers connected with certain of the trusts, together with a memorandum in each case that the certificates were thereby deposited as further and additional securities for the amount owing to each of the several trust funds. The deed was executed and the deposits made by Prance without any pressure on the part either of his co-trustees of any of the properties or of the persons beneficially interested. On Mar. 31, 1894, a receiving order was made against Prance and Garrard on their own petition. D

The trustee in bankruptcy of Prance brought an action claiming that the deed and the deposits of share certificates were void and conveyed no title as against him. The courts below upheld the conveyance and deposits of shares as against the general creditors, on the ground that Prance's object was not to prefer certain of his creditors to others, but to shield himself from the consequences of his breaches of trust, and that there was thus no fraudulent preference within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 48. The trustee appealed. H

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—I confess that I am unable to entertain any doubt about the true decision in this case. It appears to me that the first thing which one has to do in dealing with this matter is to deal with the question of fact. Certainly this instrument, which was executed two days before the bankruptcy, is

A an instrument which not unnaturally exposes itself to the inquiry what were the reasons why it was executed. So far as I am concerned, I wish to say that I entirely and absolutely agree with the view as to the question of fact on which this case was decided by the Court of Appeal. LORD ESHER, M.R., says ([1897] 2 Q.B. at p. 27) :

B “The question whether there has been a fraudulent preference depends, not upon the mere fact that there has been a preference, but also upon the state of mind of the person who made it. It must be shown not only that he has preferred a creditor, but that he has fraudulently done so. It depends upon what was in his mind. Whether it is called ‘intention’ or ‘view’ or ‘object’ does not appear to me to matter much. The question is whether in fact he had the intention to prefer certain creditors. It has been argued that the debtor must be taken to have intended the natural consequences of his act. I do not think that true for this purpose. I think that one must find out what he really did intend. The recitals in the deed seem to me to show what was really his object. It appears to me obvious that he was not actuated by any feeling of bounty towards those in whose favour the deed was made, but was doing what he did for his own benefit. He wanted to render those particular persons disinclined to proceed to extremities against him. He knew that what he had done must be discovered very shortly, and that those persons had a hold upon him, because if they chose to proceed against him the consequences to him might be very serious. He thought that if he put them as far as he could into the same position as if he had not committed the breaches of trust, that might go in mitigation of the consequences to himself. It seems to me clear, therefore, that he made this conveyance not with the ‘intention’ or ‘view’ or ‘object,’ or whatever it may be called, of preferring these persons, but for the sole purpose of shielding himself. Under these circumstances, what he did is not a fraudulent preference within the Bankruptcy Act.”

A. L. SMITH, L.J., says (ibid. at pp. 29, 30) :

F “It appears to me that this case is really covered by the decision in Ex parte Taylor (1) where the facts were identical with those of the present case, with the exception that there appears to have been in that case an actual threat of proceedings, whereas in the present case, though there appears to have been no threat of proceedings, Prancee knew perfectly well that his breaches of trust must be discovered almost immediately and that proceedings would certainly be taken against him in respect of them. The pressure upon him in either case is about identical.”

H “I ask myself what was really the view which Prancee had in making this conveyance, was it to prefer these particular trust estates to other creditors? The answer to that question must, I think, be in the negative. It was to protect himself against the charges hanging over him.”

I That being the state of facts, the question comes back to what is the true construction of the statute which your Lordships have to construe, and, speaking for myself, I should hesitate very much to differ from the opinion, which I have already quoted during the argument, of LORD CAIRNS, L.C., uttered certainly without any dissent from any other member of your Lordships' House, in Butcher v. Stead (2). He said (L.R. 7 H.L. at p. 846) :

“The Act [Bankruptcy Act, 1869], however, did not profess to express the existing law without making considerable changes in it. In the case of fraudulent preference, for example, in place of raising an inquiry whether it was done in contemplation of bankruptcy, the Act provided certain definite tests, namely, that the bankrupt should have been at the time unable to pay his debts as they became due from his own moneys, and that he should become bankrupt within three months from the date of payment. The Act appears to have left the question of pressure as it stood under the old law; and indeed the use of the word 'preference,' implying an act of free will, would of itself make it necessary to consider whether pressure had or had not been used."

I entirely assent to that view of the construction of the statute, and it appears to me that the construction for which the learned counsel for the appellant have contended would impute absurdity to the legislature. Nothing could have been easier than to have enacted, if they had thought proper to do so, that any preference to one creditor over another creditor, or any greater advantage—I do not want to use the word "preference," because questions may arise as to the true construction of that word itself—but any advantage given by previous payment to one creditor, to which advantage all the other creditors were not parties, should of itself be a preference which should be void under the statute.

Nothing, I say, could have been easier than to have made such an enactment, if that was intended, but in my opinion no such intention is to be gathered from the statute. On the contrary, as LORD CAIRNS, L.C., said, subject to certain express alterations which it then made in the previous state of the law, it did intend to bring with it all those conditions which certainly for something more than a century have been imputed to these transactions, which must be regarded as fraudulent under the bankruptcy law, payments which the legislature had prohibited, because the policy of the bankruptcy law was that upon a cessio bonorum, the whole of the creditors should be equally treated; and the state of the law from that time to the present, I think, has not been a subject of doubt. I know that what A. L. SMITH, L.J., has said with regard to what I might call the pressure upon a man's own mind, that he was not by his own voluntary act preferring one creditor to another, but was thinking of something else, has been contested at the Bar; but no authority in favour of that contention has been quoted, and there is one authority now not less than a century old—in fact 110 years old—in which that question was actually determined, and, so far as I know, it has never been disputed since.

The case to which I refer is Thompson v. Freeman (3), where the defendant had in the year 1780 joined in two bonds with the bankrupt, and had received a counter-bond of indemnity. When these bonds became due, the bankrupt, not having wherewithal to discharge them, applied again to the defendant, and engaged him to join with her in two new bonds, payable in July, 1784, for the purpose of raising money to take up one of the old bonds, and one of them was accordingly taken up on Jan. 14, 1784. The defendant took another counter-bond of indemnity upon his joining in the last two bonds. Previous to June 3, 1785, the day on which the act of bankruptcy happened, the bankrupt sent for the defendant, and proposed to him that he should take out his debts in goods, to which he acceded, and the warrant of attorney in question was given. It appears that her reason for sending for the defendant originated from a letter taking notice, though not in a threatening way, of her situation with respect to the defendant, which letter she had received just before from Messrs. Fosset and Bellamy, whom she knew to have acted in a former transaction as attorneys for the defendant, though upon this occasion they were not in fact concerned for him.

Just let us see what the facts were in that case. There was no threat, and no application for payment of the debt coupled with anything which involved legal procedure, or anything of the sort, but as a matter of fact the bankrupt in her own mind, from a mistaken sense of what was going to be done, thought that legal proceedings were going to be taken, and the assumption of the court is that it was that mistake which induced her to do the thing. LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., says (1 Term Rep. at p. 157):

"A bankrupt when in contemplation of his bankruptcy cannot by any voluntary act favour any one creditor, but if under fear of legal process he gives a preference, it is evidence that he does not do it voluntarily."

A There is the principle stated. It is not a voluntary act; and, as LORD CAIRNS, L.C., says, the word "preference" here imports in it the voluntary act of a person who can do either the one thing or the other as he prefers. LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., proceeds:

B "And though the defendant in this case had taken no steps to secure himself in case he was called upon, yet the bankrupt, acting from mistake, was under the same apprehensions of legal process as if the defendant had actually threatened her, so that her execution of the warrant of attorney was not a voluntary act, but the effect of fear, however groundless that might be."

C It seems to me that after that decision, which, as I said, has now lasted more than a hundred years, and has never, so far as I know, been controverted or qualified, it is idle to suggest that you must have an actual threat of a creditor, or the actual pressure of a creditor.

D Applying the principle laid down by LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., to the facts of this case, it is true that no one had threatened this particular bankrupt with criminal proceedings; but if the facts are such as each of the lords justices in turn described them (and in that I entirely concur), that what was in his mind was this, that when the examination in bankruptcy took place he would as a matter of fact probably be prosecuted, and sent to penal servitude for an act of misconduct of which he had been guilty, is not the belief and apprehension of such a criminal prosecution in the same position as the mistaken fear on the part of the debtor, which was commented upon by LORD MANSFIELD, that process would issue against her unless she did the thing which she did? If what the legislature had in view was the exercise of a voluntary right on the part of debtors to do what they pleased, the mere voluntarily deciding (I will not use the word "preferring") to pay one creditor, and leave another creditor unpaid—if that is really what the legislature intended to prohibit by positive enactment, then can it be said that it was a mere voluntary decision on the part of this particular bankrupt that he would favour one set of creditors rather than another, when in truth and in fact it was an endeavour to save himself from a criminal prosecution, which induced him to do the act in question? It becomes then no longer a voluntary act, but an act under pressure—pressure not the less because it is pressure upon his own mind and his own consciousness, from an apprehension of what will happen if bankruptcy takes place—not a pressure by threats of creditors to assert their rights. It becomes unnecessary to raise other questions which have been disposed of before.

G The Solicitor-General suggested that there was a proposition which could be maintained, as to which I confess that I entertain grave doubts whether any decision goes to that extent, namely, that the relation between a cestui que trust and a trustee is not that of a creditor and debtor. That it may be something more than that is true, but that it is that of creditor and debtor I can entertain no doubt. As that question has been mooted and brought before your Lordships' House as one question for decision here, I certainly have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion no such proposition can properly be maintained, and that, although there are other and peculiar elements in the relation between a cestui que trust and a trustee, undoubtedly the relation of creditor and debtor can and does exist. It is admitted that the question as to the securities deposited must follow the same rule as is now enunciated in respect of the deed executed two days before the bankruptcy, therefore I give no separate judgment upon that. On the whole, I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

I LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with what was said by LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in Butcher v. Stead (2) (L.R. 7 H.L. at p. 846), in the passage cited by my noble and learned friend. I think that the law with regard to the question of pressure is left precisely as it was under the old law, and I think that the word "preference" in itself involves and imports a free choice. I do not think that this gentleman at the time when he executed this deed was in a position to execute it with free choice at all. I think that he executed it under an overwhelming sense of very imminent peril. The fact that two years before he had had this deed prepared shows to my mind that he had a sense of his dangerous position before his mind at that time; and at the last moment, when it became certain that he would be exposed to bankruptcy and all its consequences, including the examination that would follow, he executed the deed. I think that he executed it simply with the view of protecting himself. I doubt whether he had any intention of preferring these particular creditors at all. I think that he only regarded himself. I think that if he regarded the creditors at all it was only with a very secondary view indeed. The case seems to me to be very clear, and I am very glad to find that the stream of authority on this subject is so uniform and consistent.

LORD SHAND.— I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be adhered to, and I prefer the grounds upon which the Court of Appeal have put their judgments to those of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. It seems to me that by a stream of authority it has now been settled, whatever may have been the case a number of years ago, that it is necessary to consider, as A. L. SMITH, L.J., said ([1897] 2 Q.B. at p. 29), what was the dominant or real motive of the person making the preference, and I think that the dominant or real motive which led to the granting of this deed was that the bankrupt intended to protect himself. I think that was the true purpose which he had in executing it.

A local authority made proposals under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, for the sewerage of a street. A provisional apportionment was made and notices of objections were given. The street in question was formed between 1806 and 1816, and was then, and had always remained since, open at both ends into old highways. The street and buildings had existed in their present condition and position for seventy years at least, and it was admitted that, since its formation, the street had been used by foot passengers without interruption. No repairs had ever been done to the street at the public expense, and there was some evidence to the effect that certain minor repairs and the removal of refuse had been done at private expense.

Held: (i) this was not a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, being a footway repairable by the inhabitants at large; and (ii) the burden of proof was upon the authority to show that a street was a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

Notes. The Public Street Works Act, 1892, was repealed by the Highways Act, 1959. Sections 213 (1) and 174 (1)-(3) of the latter Act correspond to ss. 5 and 6 respectively of the 1892 Act. By s. 213 (1) of the 1959 Act a private street is now defined as being "a street not being a highway maintainable at public expense."

Case Stated by justices for the county of Lancaster.

Upon the hearing and determining of objections under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to the proposals of the authority with reference to the sewerage of Back Pleasant Street within Haslingden and the provisional apportionment of the expenses thereof. It was admitted before the justices that the Private Street Works Act, 1892, had been duly adopted by the authority, and that the usual notices had been served upon the owners of property fronting, adjoining, and abutting on the street, and had been duly posted and advertised, and that notices of objections had been duly given by ten of the fifteen property owners included in the provisional apportionment. The appellant was one of the ten objectors. The following were the grounds of objection stated by the appellant, and also by the other objectors in their several notices of objections. (i) That Back Pleasant Street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892. (ii) That Back Pleasant Street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. (iii) That the proposed works were unreasonable. (iv) That Back Pleasant Street has already been sewerage to the satisfaction of the Haslingden Urban Sanitary Authority.

The estimate for the work was admitted to be reasonable and equitably apportioned among the various owners, but these objections were relied upon by the appellant as showing the non-liability of the owners to do or pay for the work, and were heard and decided by the justices as hereinafter appears. A plan of the street in question and proposed sewerage was produced before the justices which was readily understood by them, as they both personally knew the locality well. The streets and buildings referred to in this case had existed in their present condition and position for seventy years at least. The question raised by objections numbered (i) and (ii) were first considered. It was admitted that Back Pleasant Street is a back street about 147yds. in length and varies in width, being 7ft. 6in. wide at the top and 8ft. 6in. wide at the bottom end nearest Deardengate and forms the north-west portion of a plot of land taken by a building association in the year 1806 for the erection of fifty houses, that these houses were erected by such association between the years 1806 and 1816, when the houses were conveyed by the trustees of such association to the several members thereof, that the houses were built twenty-five on each side of a new street made by the association, called Pleasant Street, which is 36ft. wide, with the backs of one row of houses abutting upon a street known as Far Back Pleasant Street, and the back of the other row of houses abutting upon Back Pleasant Street; that Pleasant Street and Back Pleasant Street, each run from Deardengate which is the main street of Haslingden to Bury Road which is one of the principal thoroughfares, that the houses erected by the association run the whole length of Pleasant Street and Back Pleasant Street from Deardengate to Bury Road, that Back Pleasant Street and Pleasant Street were respectively formed as they now exist at the time of the erection of the houses by the association, that there was never any chain, gate, or other barrier or obstruction in or at either end of Back Pleasant Street, that there is a passage of 4ft. in width leading from Back Pleasant Street to Pleasant Street, about half-way down the street, that the north-west boundary of Back Pleasant Street is a wall running the whole length of the street, which wall forms the boundary of the back yards and conveniences of houses erected on the opposite side thereof, and which houses front to Hindle Street in the Borough, that the wall forming the north-west boundary of the street belongs from Bury Road to a point about half-way down Back Pleasant Street to the owners on the Pleasant Street side thereof, and thenceforward into Deardengate, to the owners on the Hindle Street side thereof, that there are openings in that part of the wall which belongs to the owners on the Hindle Street side thereof for the emptying of the ashpits and conveniences of their houses, and that that part of the wall mentioned first, has been kept in repair, and re-built by the owners of property on the Pleasant Street side thereof and the other part by the owners of property on the Hindle Street side thereof, and that since its formation Back Pleasant Street has been used by foot passengers without interruption.

The following evidence was given for the respondents. Thomas Whittaker said :

"I now own a house at the corner of Bury Road and Pleasant Street, until recently owned by my mother, abutting upon Pleasant Street and Back Pleasant Street. I have repaired the wall on the north-west side of Back Pleasant Street opposite to my house. A man used to temporarily repair and clean the street for my mother, opposite to our property, but only by clearing away refuse thrown over the wall out of the back yards in Hindle Street."

Thomas Severe said :

"I lived at the house at the corner of Back Pleasant Street and Bury Road for forty-seven years from the year 1845. Mr. Ramsay, agent for a former owner of the property belonging to the last witness, and the mother of the last witness, each repaired Back Pleasant Street, opposite to their property, many a time, and Mrs. Whittaker claimed Back Pleasant Street as a private

A road. Their object in repairing was to clean the street opposite to their property. On one occasion, between 1845 and 1849, I saw Mr. Ramsay prevent a man with a horse and cart from going down Back Pleasant Street, and he told him it was a private street and the stranger had no right to go down the street. I only saw this one person stopped. I never heard of anyone else being stopped. It was not used by the public except by foot-passengers, who used the street without interruption. Pleasant Street would be better for passengers than Back Pleasant Street. Back Pleasant Street was only used by carts for the back privileges, taking away ashes, etc."

Richard Taylor, borough surveyor, produced the plan of the street and the proposed sewer. He had been surveyor to the authority about sixteen years. He had never repaired the street except on one occasion, and that was at the request of a solicitor who occupied an office at the corner of Back Pleasant Street and Deardengate, and the entrance to whose office was in Back Pleasant Street. The solicitor told him his landlord declined to do any repairs in the street, and he wanted a clean approach to his office. The solicitor offered out of his own pocket to pay for the paving of the street from a point opposite to his office door to Deardengate, if the surveyor would do the work. The surveyor did the work and sent the bill to the solicitor who paid it. Pleasant Street was originally and is now paved with cobbles, and he had from time to time repaired it in the same style. Pleasant Street is treated as a highway repairable by the public, but is not yet paved with modern setts.

Upon this evidence it was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the respondents had made out no case, that the onus probandi was upon the respondents, and it was for them to show that Back Pleasant Street was a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and to do this, having regard to a definition of a street in the Act, they must show and had failed to show that it was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. Further, that the evidence already given proved that Back Pleasant Street was a highway repairable by the public, inasmuch as it had been used by foot-passengers uninterruptedly for eighty years, and had never been repaired in any real sense by the private owners at any time. Being satisfied that the evidence already given was, in the absence of rebutting evidence, sufficient for the respondents' purpose, the justices overruled the objection.

The appellant then called John Holt, who said he was born in December, 1820, in a house in Back Pleasant Street and lived there forty years. He had since then lived in Pleasant Street and Hindle Street. He had known Back Pleasant Street all his life, and never knew anyone stopped. Carts, horses, and foot-passengers had always used it. Pleasant Street and Back Pleasant Street were made before his time, and these streets were much used by people going between Bury Road and Deardengate. Manchester Road, which is a road going from Deardengate a little below Pleasant Street and joining Bury Road farther down, was not made until 1828. He remembered Manchester road being made. Richard Lord said he had known Back Pleasant Street forty years, and never knew it treated as anything but a public street. George Law said he was sixty-six years old, and had known Back Pleasant Street all his life. It was always, so far as he knew, open to the public for all purposes. John Ashworth, an old surveyor of highways, in flagging the footpath in Pleasant Street had put the scaplings which were left after the flags had been dressed upon Back Pleasant Street solely to save the trouble of carting them away. He took them through the house from the front street to the back. This would be in 1873.

After hearing the appellant's evidence on objections (i) and (ii) the justices were satisfied that no repairs of a permanent character had been executed by anyone in Back Pleasant Street, though occasionally refuse had been cleaned off and inequalities removed by scraping or laying down a few flags or stones here and there from time to time by private tenants or owners, and that Back Pleasant

Street has not up to the present time been paved or flagged, but the surface of the street is simply the original soil. From its limited width (being in no part of its length more than 8ft. 6in. in width), and from its close proximity to Pleasant Street, 36ft. in width, the justices were further satisfied that Back Pleasant Street was never intended nor ever used (in the ordinary meaning of the word "used") as a public road, though occasionally foot-passengers might pass along it, but it was made and practically used only by those desiring access to or egress from the back of the houses on the north-west side of Pleasant Street, also that from the manner in which the houses of the said association were built in 1816 it was evident that Pleasant Street was intended for and has ever since been used by the public as a highway, and that Back Pleasant Street and Far Back Pleasant Street were mere passages or back streets made for and as narrow as compatible with the requirements of the tenants occupying the houses in Pleasant Street. The justices, therefore, held that Back Pleasant Street had not at any time been used by the public as a thoroughfare, and was not a highway repairable by the public.

The following evidence was then called by the respondents on the question raised by objections (iii) and (iv), that the proposed works are unreasonable, and that Back Pleasant Street has already been sewered to the satisfaction of the Haslingden Urban Sanitary Authority.

Richard Taylor, the borough surveyor, said :

"Back Pleasant Street is not sewered. The Haslingden Local Board was formed in 1878, and Haslingden was incorporated in 1891. The present drain was laid when the houses were built in Pleasant Street except as to a short length at the Deardengate end of the street. The drain runs from the Bury Road end of Back Pleasant Street nearly the whole length of the street through the back yards of the houses abutting upon Back Pleasant Street, and drains the length of these houses. Near the Deardengate end there is a drain from some of the houses in Hindle Street, which crosses Back Pleasant Street, and is connected with the drain in the back yards. The present drain varies in depth from 2ft. 4in. to 3ft. 3in. below the surface. The cellars are not and cannot be drained by it. A part of the drain is constructed of earthenware pipes and the remainder is simply a stone drain. Near the Deardengate end of Back Pleasant Street the drain comes out of the back yards into Back Pleasant Street, and here, constructed as a sewer, runs down the centre of that street into the sewer in Deardengate. The latter portion of the sewer, which is 26ft. in length, was constructed some years ago by the authority at their own expense, and it is not intended to be relaid, and the expense of it is not included in the provisional apportionment. In 1886 Dr. Harrison, one of the objectors, re-built some property in Pleasant Street and Back Pleasant Street, and submitted plans to the Haslingden Local Board showing, inter alia, the present drain at that particular point, and how he proposed to divert the drain and connect with the sewer. The plans were approved and no objection was taken by the authority, to the drain, and its insufficiency has never been raised until notices were given in connection with the present proceedings. A general system of sewerage of the district has been under consideration for some years, and has only recently been agreed upon. It is now intended to substitute for the present drain a sewer to run the whole length of Back Pleasant Street down the centre of the street at a depth suitable to, and in accordance with the general system of sewerage of the town, and that each house be separately connected with such sewer."

For the appellant and the other objectors it was contended that the drains in the back yards of the property in Back Pleasant Street had been in existence for many years, not simply as a drain for a few houses, but as a sewer receiving the sewage of the houses on both sides of Back Pleasant Street and belonging to different owners, and the inaction of the town authorities in years past, and particularly when Dr. Harrison's plans were before them, prohibited the respondents from treating this sewer now as simply a private drain; and further that, as all sewers were now vested in the urban authority, it was the duty of the respondents to make any alterations in its structure or position at the public expense. Further, that the passive attitude of the respondents in past years was evidence that Back Pleasant Street was sewered to their satisfaction and that the expense of constructing the new sewer must be borne by them.

After hearing this evidence the justices considered the question whether the drain was a sewer which had vested in and became repairable by the respondents, and decided in the negative. In their opinion the very construction and position precluded its ever having been sanctioned by any public authority as a suitable sewer. It was not uniform in construction, but where made of stone was certainly faulty. Its position prevented it draining the cellars; therefore to that extent the houses were not sewered at all. The delay in not requiring the owners to put in a proper sewer was fully understood as, until the present system of drainage was decided upon, the levels, etc., could not be stated, and further, that no unreasonable delay had taken place after a general system of drainage had been adopted. The justices therefore disallowed the objections and approved the proposals of the respondents, and the provisional apportionments of the expenses.

The questions for the consideration of the court are :— (i) Were the justices right in overruling the objection taken on behalf of the appellant that the onus probandi was upon the respondents to show that Back Pleasant Street was a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and that they had failed to do so? (ii) Were the justices justified upon the evidence in holding that Back Pleasant Street is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large? (iii) Were the justices justified upon the evidence in holding that Back Pleasant Street is a street not sewered to the satisfaction of the authority?

Dec. 21, 1898. — CHANNELL, J., read the following judgment of the court. — This was a case stated by magistrates under s. 33 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The appellant Rishton had duly objected to being charged with a proportion of the expenses of sewerage a street called Back Pleasant Street, in Haslingden, and the magistrates, having heard the objections, decided against him and stated this case. The objections resolved themselves into two: first, that Back Pleasant Street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; and, secondly, that it had already been sewered to the satisfaction of the respondents. The Case states that Back Pleasant Street was formed between 1806 and 1816, and was then and has always remained since open at both ends into old highways; and that the street and buildings have existed in their present condition and position for seventy years at least, and there is an express admission that, since its formation, Back Pleasant Street had been used by foot-passengers without interruption. The Case then sets out the evidence of the witnesses both for the respondents and the appellant, and the magistrates state their reasons for coming to the conclusion that Back Pleasant Street was not a highway repairable by the public. They submit, as to this part of the Case, two questions: (i) Were we right in overruling the objection taken on behalf of the appellant that the onus probandi was upon the respondents to show that Back Pleasant Street was a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and that they had failed to do so? (ii) Were we justified upon the evidence in holding that Back Pleasant Street is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The first of these questions is not very important. The onus probandi clearly was on the respondents, but now that we have before us not only the evidence of the respondents but also that of the appellant, it becomes unnecessary to consider what would have been the effect of the respondents' evidence had it stood alone, and whether or not it would have satisfied the onus. The second question is the one which must decide this part of the case. The magistrates ask, "Were we justified in finding?" It is contended that, as the magistrates can only state a Case upon a point of law, and must themselves decide a question of fact, the question means, "Was there any evidence upon which we could find as we did?" and this we must think is so.

If the whole matter were open to us, we should probably come to the conclusion that Back Pleasant Street was, and had been from the time of its formation, a highway not only for foot-passengers but also for carts and carriages. It is a very strong fact that it was from the first a thoroughfare open at both ends to old highways. The fact that no repairs have been done to it at the public expense is a matter of very small weight, having regard to the nature of the place, and the suggested repairs at private expense were only the cleaning of refuse away and other small matters. If it was a highway before 1835, it would be repairable by the inhabitants at large without any formalities having been gone through to take it over. The whole question, however, is not open to us, and as there is in the evidence of Thomas Severe one case of a horse and cart being stopped, and as on the question of carriage-way the fact that the public have not repaired is a much stronger piece of evidence than it is in reference to a footway, we think that we cannot hold that there was no evidence upon which the magistrates could find that this was not a public carriage-way. On the question whether it was a public footway the admission appears to us conclusive, and there is nothing whatever in the evidence set out inconsistent with this.

The points urged before us by the counsel for the respondents as evidence justifying the finding of the magistrates, which we must assume to be, although they do not very distinctly state it, that there was, at least before 1835, no further footway are the absence of proof of public repairs, the suggested proof of private repairs, and the original construction of the passage in question. As to these, the construction appears to us to favour its being a public footway, the private repairs are not proved even in the view of the magistrates, and the absence of public repairs is accounted for by the nature of the place. We think, therefore, that this case must be dealt with upon the footing that this was prior to 1835 a public footway. It was urged that only one witness spoke as to the time before 1835, but any difficulty on that point is quite got over by the admissions. This being so, and there having been no addition to the old footway, it seems to us that the place in question is not a "street" within the definition in the Private Street Works Act, 1892. It is not like the case where there being an old footway, a new street has been formed by throwing into it more land. On this ground we think that the appeal must be allowed, and it becomes unnecessary for us to decide the other question whether the respondents can now declare themselves not satisfied with the sewerage of Back Pleasant Street, or whether the case comes within the doctrine of Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board of Health (1) and the subsequent cases following that case.

It appears to us that it is in fact sewered, although very imperfectly and badly, and that as there has been no change whatever in this street for seventy years, and the respondents have been contented with it ever since they became an authority, they cannot say that they are dissatisfied with it. We think that the decision of ROMER, J., in Handsworth Local Board v. Taylor (2), which was quoted to us, applies only to a growing street, and that in the present case, if there had been new buildings fronting this street, the respondents might have said they had never been satisfied with the sewerage of the street which it had become. They have, however, been satisfied with the sewerage of the street which in fact it is. The necessity for the works now proposed has not arisen from any change of things in the street in question, but from a new general system of sewerage of the district having been recently adopted. The new sewer for this locality is really wanted for two houses in Pleasant Street and Hindle Street, and it would be a

A very remarkable result of the legislation if the fact of there being a private back passage between these two streets enabled the respondents to do at the private expense of the owners works which, if there were no such passage, would have to be done at the public expense. If this view is correct the appeal should be allowed on this ground also; but we have not very fully considered it, and base our judgment upon the ground that the place in question is not a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, being a footway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Promissory Note—Renunciation—Delivery to “maker”—Delivery to devisee of maker—Note payable “on demand”—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 62.

Contract—Release—Release not under seal—Consideration required in law and equity.

W. borrowed a sum of money from E. and gave him a promissory note payable to him on demand. W. died, charging his real estate by will with the payment of his debts, and E. voluntarily handed the promissory note to one of W.'s devisees with the intention of releasing the debt, but without making any written renunciation. In an action to recover the sum lent,

Held: (i) at law a release not under seal must fall within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 62 (as governed by s. 89), any inconsistent rule under the law merchant being no longer applicable; (ii) as a promissory note payable “on demand” was payable at once without any demand and might be sued upon accordingly, it matured as soon as it was made and delivered to the payee, and it was, therefore, capable of being renounced under s. 62; but, (iii) although a release might be effected under this section by delivery to the personal representative of the acceptor of a bill or of the maker of a promissory note, the delivery to his devisee was not sufficient; (iv) there was no release in equity as there was no consideration, and, there being no conduct on the part of the creditor which would make it inequitable to enforce the claim, the loan was recoverable; and (v) it did not matter that the plaintiff was unable to hand over the promissory note to the defendants as it was already in the defendants' possession; accordingly, there being no release or discharge at law or in equity and no conduct on the part of E. which precluded his representatives from obtaining payment from the devisees, the action succeeded.

Appeal by the defendants, the devisees of the real estate of Walter Walters deceased, from an order of KEKEWICH, J., by which he ordered that the sum of £200 with interest should be raised out of this real estate and paid to the plaintiff as administratrix of the Rev. Abraham Edwards deceased. G

On Aug. 1, 1865, the Rev. Abraham Edwards lent £200 to his brother-in-law Walter Walters, for which son Walters gave Edwards a promissory note payable on demand, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum. The note was made payable simply to Edwards, without the words "or order." In 1866 Walters died, leaving the debt of £200 unpaid. By his will he devised certain real estate specifically to his son and his daughter, Thomas Walters and Annie Evans, widow, and he also charged his real estate with the payment of his debts. His executors wound-up his estate and paid his debts, with the exception of the debt of £200, of the existence of which they were ignorant. In October, 1894, Edwards died, and in 1895 an action was brought by his administratrix against Thomas Walters and Annie Evans, as the devisees of the real estate of Walter Walters, and also against his executors, for the purpose of obtaining payment of the £200, with interest, out of the devised real estate. H

The evidence showed that the defendants, Thomas Walters and Annie Evans, had during the life of Edwards voluntarily made him some payments by way of interest at 4 per cent. on the £200, the first of these payments being in 1878 and the last in 1889. There was also evidence that, in 1891, when Walter Walters's I

A daughter Annie Evans was on a visit to her uncle Mr. Edwards, he delivered up the promissory note to her, saying that he gave it to her.

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8 (4) :

By s. 62 (1) :

C "When the holder of a bill, at or after its maturity, absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor."

By s. 83 (1) :

D "A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another signed by the maker, engaging to pay, on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money, to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer."

By s. 89 :

E "(1.) (with certain exceptions) The provisions of this Act relating to bills of exchange apply, with the necessary modifications, to promissory notes; (2.) In applying those provisions the maker of a note shall be deemed to correspond with the acceptor of a bill."

By s. 97 (2) :

F "The rules of common law including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to bills of exchange, promissory notes and cheques."

On Jan. 31, 1896 KEKEWICH, J., gave judgment for the raising of the £200, with interest, out of the devised real estate. From that decision the devisees, Thomas Walters and Annie Evans, now appealed.

April 28, 1896. The following judgments were read.

H LINDLEY, L.J.— This was an action by the administratrix of a creditor against the executors and the devisees of his debtor for the administration of his real and personal estate and for payment of £200 and interest.

[ On Aug. 5, 1865, Walters borrowed £200 from Edwards and gave him a promissory note for the amount. It is to be observed that the note was not negotiable when made, not being payable to order or bearer, but the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8 (4), appears to apply to it and to make it negotiable after that Act came into force. Walters, the maker of the note, died in 1866; the defendants are his legal personal representatives and devisees of his real estate. By his will he charged his real estate with his debts. In October, 1894, Edwards, the creditor, died, and the plaintiff is his administratrix. The £200 has never been paid, and Walters's legal personal representatives have no personal assets with which to pay it. Whether they ever had I do not know. Interest on the debt was paid by Walters's devisees to Edwards up to 1889; the last payment was made within six years before the commencement of this action. If this were all, the devisees of Walters's real estate would have no defence to the action. But they contend that Edwards in his lifetime released the debt. What he did was this. In April or June, 1891, he gave the note to Mrs. Evans, who was one of the devisees, telling her in effect that he never should make any claim under it and that she might keep it. Mrs. Evans has kept it from that time until now. The note was not endorsed to her, nor was there any writing at the time throwing any light on this transaction.

What, then, is the effect of this transaction? It is contended that it is a release at law, or at all events in equity. A release at law is sought to be established by the law merchant apart from the Bills of Exchange Act, and if not by the law merchant then by s. 62 of that Act. The law merchant is stated in Foster v. Dauber (3). I do not understand that it applied to bills or notes not negotiable, but this difficulty is removed by s. 8 (4), to which I have already alluded. The law merchant is adopted with modifications in s. 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act. The modification introduced is the necessity for a writing unless the bill is given up to the acceptor. In this particular the law merchant is inconsistent with the express provisions of s. 62. The argument of the defendants, based on s. 97 (2), and on the law merchant which before the Act formed part of the common law of England, cannot be supported.

Reliance is then placed on s. 62 of the Act. This section, though in terms applicable to bills of exchange, is by s. 89 made applicable to promissory notes and to promissory notes payable to a particular person without the addition of the words "or order or bearer:" see s. 8 (4). Section 62, therefore, applies to the promissory note which is in question here. The maker of a promissory note corresponds with the acceptor of a bill (s. 89 (2)). A promissory note payable on demand is payable at once without any demand and may be sued upon accordingly. Such a note, therefore, "matures" within the meaning of s. 62 as soon as the note is made and delivered to the payee: see Re George, Francis v. Bruce (1).

I will now paraphrase s. 62 and apply it to a promissory note payable on demand. The section will run thus: "When the holder of a promissory note payable on demand absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the maker the note is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the note is delivered up to the maker." In the present case there was no renunciation in writing. Can it then be said that it was delivered up to the maker? The maker had long been dead; but I am not prepared to say that the legal personal representatives of an acceptor or maker would not be included in the word acceptor or maker. The ordinary use of language and the general understanding of business men as well as of lawyers warrant such an interpretation of the word acceptor or maker in such a context. As LORD MACCLESFIELD said in Hyde v. Skinner (4) (2 P. Wms. at p. 196), "the executors of every person are implied in himself:" BYLES ON BILLS (11th Edn.), p. 53. But I cannot go further and say that acceptor or maker in this section means or includes a legatee or devisee. Such an interpretation is not warranted either by the ordinary use of language or by the general understanding of business men or of lawyers. Consequently, s. 62 does not justify the contention that this note was discharged by the gift of it to Mrs. Evans. In the course of the argument I expressed a doubt whether, as the plaintiff was not the holder of the note, she could sue the maker's representative either on the note or for money lent to the maker: see Crowe v. Clay (5); but as the devisees themselves hold the note and are not liable to be sued upon it by anyone, the reasoning on which that case was decided does not apply. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that there has been no release or discharge at law of the debt due to Edwards's estate from Walters's estate. The defence founded on the statute of limitations fails as regards the devisees of the real estates by reason of their payment of interest: see Re Hollingshead, Hollingshead v. Webster (6).

There remains only the question whether the devisees of the real estate have been discharged in equity though not at law. Edwards in his lifetime made no claim against Walters's executors, but there is no evidence to show that the

A devisees had been prejudiced by the mode in which the personal estate has been dealt with. There is no evidence that there was any. Moreover, the devisees for many years paid interest on the £200, and, apart from the gift of the note to Mrs. Evans, there is no ground for saying that Edwards so conducted himself as to render it inequitable on his part to insist on payment of his debt out of the real estate devised to those who recognised his demand. The gift of the note to Mrs. Evans is unquestionably strong evidence of an intention to forgive the debt; but unfortunately the note was not endorsed by the payee. Mrs. Evans could not, therefore, sue on it in her own name, nor was there any consideration for the transaction. There was no consideration to support an agreement not to sue. There is, in fact, nothing except an intention not carried out. Such an incomplete transaction does not amount to a gift of the debt nor to an equitable release of it.

C In Taylor v. Manners (2) TURNER, L.J., expressed a doubt whether a gift by a secured creditor of his security to the debtor might not amount even at law to a release of the debt if such was the intention of the creditor; but I confess I cannot adopt his suggestion. TURNER, L.J., came to the conclusion that there was an agreement to release, and a consideration for such agreement. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., differed. The decision, therefore, does not really assist the plaintiff.

D At law exoneration before breach need not be under seal, but a release must be under seal except in the cases provided by s. 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act. A release in equity is often spoken of as something easy to establish. But I am not aware of any circumstances which amount to a release in equity and not at law except an agreement for valuable consideration to give a release or not to sue. Such an agreement, unless there is some reason for not enforcing it, has in equity

E the effect of a release. Again, a creditor may so conduct himself as to preclude himself from obtaining equitable relief and even from enforcing a legal demand. This I understand to have been TURNER, L.J.'s, meaning when he said (1 Ch. App. at p. 56) he was not satisfied that there might not be considerations which would in this court prevent a debt from being enforced, although it might be subsisting at law. But to call such conduct a release in equity suggests false analogies and

In this case there is no release or discharge at law or in equity, and no conduct on the part of Mr. Edwards which precludes his representatives from obtaining payment from the devisees. An intention to discharge them from their liability is established, but that unfortunately is insufficient to afford them a defence to the claim made against them. A court of equity cannot enforce a mere intention to

G give and forgive. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I will not recapitulate the facts, which have been already stated by LINDLEY, L.J. This note is payable to a person designated without the addition of "order" or "bearer," and would not have been negotiable before the statute—the

H Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The old law, therefore, as stated by BYLES, J., in his book on BILLS, would be inapplicable, and the defendant would have had no answer. It was contended that the statute of 1882 did not apply, because this was not a negotiable instrument; but this contention cannot be maintained if s. 8 of the statute is looked at. Section 8 refers to a note, and clearly covers a note made payable to a specified person. This note is, therefore, within the statute and the

I case is governed by s. 62. [His LORDSHIP read that section, and continued: The note must be mature; a note such as this, a note payable on demand, is at maturity immediately it is made.

The holder here has, in my opinion, by parol absolutely and unconditionally renounced his rights against the acceptor. But the statute says that the renunciation must be in writing, unless the bill or note is delivered up to the acceptor. There was no writing, and the bill was not delivered up to the acceptor, or in this case to the maker. It was delivered up to the devisees of the maker, who were no parties to the note, and could not have been sued on it. I am clearly of opinion that this is not either within the words or the meaning of the statute. It may be that the words "acceptor" or "maker" would include any person liable on the bill, such, for instance, as the personal representative of the acceptor or maker; but I am quite clear that it cannot include the devisees of the maker or make the estate of the testator liable. The case is taken out of the statute of limitations by payments made by the devisees. There has been no release at law, and no discharge in equity. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—The administrator of a man named Edwards has brought this action against the executors and against the devisees of real estate of a person named Walters to recover a sum of £200 lent in 1865 by Edwards to Walters. Walters died in 1866. By his will he charged his real estate with payment of his debts. His executors were ignorant of the existence of this debt; and have completely administered his personal estate; but the devisees of the real estate of Walters paid interest upon the debt for some years, and up to 1889. The defence is that the debt has been released. It appears that Walters gave a promissory note to Edwards for the amount, and that in April or June, 1891, Edwards gave up to the devisees the promissory note with the intention of releasing the debt. The learned judge has found this to be the fact, and there seems no reason to doubt it.

The question is whether this operated as an effectual release at law or in equity. By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 62 :

"When the holder of a bill at or after its maturity absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing, unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor."

By s. 89 the provisions of the Act apply with the necessary modifications to promissory notes. Therefore, in s. 62 we must read in this case "maker" instead of "acceptor." The difficulty is to say that this note has been delivered up to the maker. The actual maker, of course, was Walters, and it was not delivered up to him; but if it had been delivered up to his executors after his death I should think that would do; because they might have been sued on the note as standing in the place of the maker. The devisees of his real estate are not in the same position as his executors for this purpose. There is nothing in the Act to bring them within the definition of makers of the note. They might be joined with the executors in an action to make the real estate which they took under the will of the maker of the note liable for its payment, as has been done in this case. Payment on account by them would keep this right against that real estate alive, as was determined in Roddam v. Morley (7) and in Re Hollingshead (6). But these considerations do not authorise the court to say that the devisees of the real estate of the maker are themselves makers within the meaning of s. 62 of this statute, or that they stand in the position of the deceased maker as his executors may be said to do.

Before the statute the liability of any party to the note might be discharged by an express renunciation, without writing and without consideration. This was by the law merchant: Foster v. Dawber (3); but it only applied to those who were parties to the note. The statute has altered this by requiring the renunciation to be in writing. I have no doubt that, if the renunciation was made as required by the Act, the debt would be completely discharged, and no action could be maintained on the note or to recover the loan.

It is argued that the case does not come within the Act at all; that the renunciation contemplated by the Act is only against the maker, and if these defendants are not makers, the matter may be treated as outside the statute, and that the loan has been effectually released so far as they were concerned. The only authority cited for this was Taylor v. Manners (2), where TURNER, L.J., intimated rather doubtfully an opinion that the giving up of a policy of insurance which was the

A security for a debt might operate as a total release of the debt. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., dissented. I do not see how this could be a release in equity unless there was a valuable consideration for the release, and no case has been cited in which such a transaction has been held to be a release at law.

B Then it was said that no one could sue for the debt in this case unless he was in a position to hand over the note to the defendants, and that would undoubtedly be so if there was any chance of the defendants being exposed to the risk of being sued upon the note by the holder. But no such danger can possibly arise, because the note is in the defendant's own hands. With every desire to assist the defendants in a case in which it seems clear that the payee of the note intended to release all claim against them, I feel bound to hold that he has not carried out that intention effectually. He might have made the renunciation in writing, in which case I C incline to think it would have been sufficient. He has not done this; he has made an attempt to give up the claim, which, being without consideration, and not complying with the statute, in my opinion, has not discharged the real estate devised to these defendants from liability.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the Supreme Court of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope (DE VILLIERS, C.J., BUCHANAN and UPINGTON, JJ.), dated Mar. 11, 1895, whereby the court refused (inter alia) a declaration that they were entitled to certain lands and rights granted to them by Sigcau, a former paramount chief of Eastern Pondoland, and entered judgment for the defendant, the Prime Minister of that colony, who was sued in his official capacity. D

The appellants claimed to be entitled to certain rights to be exercised in Eastern Pondoland under the four several documents hereinafter mentioned. Eastern Pondoland was geographically a tract of country on the south-eastern coast of Africa, which in 1878, was occupied by divers barbaric tribes or clans under chiefs or headsmen, of whom one Unquikela, as being the most powerful by virtue of his descent and in military force, was paramount. At that time the internal condition of the district had become unsettled and dangerous, and for the protection of British subjects resident or trading there, as well as in the interests of the neighbouring colonies, Her Majesty asserted and established her supreme authority over the district by a proclamation dated Sept. 4, 1878. A British Resident was appointed under that proclamation, and such appointment was duly notified to the native chiefs. From 1878 until the district was annexed to Cape Colony, as hereinafter mentioned, Her Majesty was represented by a Resident in Eastern Pondoland. On Jan. 5, 1885, Her Majesty, by Her High Commissioner in South Africa, publicly notified the exercise of her Protectorate over the whole coast of Pondoland. The Customs dues prevailing in the Cape Colony were and had from a period anterior to the date of the earliest of the alleged concessions, herinafter mentioned, been applicable to goods imported into Eastern Pondoland. E

In 1888 Unquikela died, and one Sigcau succeeded to him as paramount among the local chiefs in Eastern Pondoland. The appellants obtained from Sigcau certain concessions contained in four documents, as follows. By a document dated April 10, 1889, Sigcau purported to grant to the appellants, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, and to whomsoever they might transfer the whole or any part of their right, the sole and exclusive right to search for, remove, and enjoy all minerals, metals, and precious stones, including coal, derivable, lying, or contained in Eastern Pondoland, for the term of ninety-nine years from Jan. 1, 1889. The document purported to confer divers other rights, including the right to import into Eastern Pondoland, free of charge or impost, plant, stores, and provisions, and to construct railways, tramways, roads, bridges, and canals. By another document dated Oct. 24, 1890, Sigcau purported to grant to the appellants as aforesaid the sole and exclusive right to construct, maintain, and work a railway in Eastern Pondoland, starting, if practicable, at the extreme mouth of the St. John's River on the eastern bank thereof, and to proceed in any direction and take such route through Eastern Pondoland as the appellants should think fit, and to maintain and work the same when constructed for a term of ninety-nine years. The document purported to grant other sole rights, including the right to take and retain free of F G H I

A charge land at Port St. John's, in Her Majesty's possession, and at the terminus of the proposed railway. By another document of Oct. 4, 1891, Sigcau purported to grant to the appellants as aforesaid, for a period of ninety-nine years from Oct. 4, 1891, renewable at the expiration thereof for a further period of ninety-nine years, two pieces of land in Eastern Pondoland, each piece not to be of less extent than 3,000 Cape morgen (being 6,000 acres or upwards in English measurement). The document did not define the situation of the pieces of land, except that they were to be respectively at the starting point and the terminus of the said proposed railway. By another document dated June 30, 1893, Sigcau purported to grant to the appellants for a term of ninety-nine years, with the right of renewal reckoned from June 30, 1893, 160 square miles of land in Eastern Pondoland, the site and selection whereof was to be determined by the appellants at any time after the signing of that document, and he also thereby purported to grant to the appellants the right to trade throughout Eastern Pondoland free of all duty so far as the said country was concerned.

The document of Oct. 24, 1890, purported to be signed by certain chiefs in addition to Sigcau, and each of the documents purported to be witnessed by certain chiefs. On Mar. 31, 1894, a corporation styled the Pondoland Incorporation, claiming as assignees of the appellants, applied to the Premier of Cape Colony for the ratification of the alleged concessions, but such ratification was refused, and the alleged concessions were never ratified or recognised. The appellants never at any time were in possession of the land granted to them by the aforesaid documents. On Mar. 17, 1894, Eastern Pondoland was, with the assent of all, or a great majority, of the chiefs, formally ceded to Her Majesty.

E On Aug. 14, 1894, an Act called the Pondoland Annexation Act, 1894, was passed by the colonial legislature, and received the assent of the Governor (Colonial Statute, No. 5 of 1894). This Act, after reciting that it was the intention of Her Majesty the Queen to issue her Royal Letters Patent to authorise the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, by proclamation under his hand and the public seal of the colony, to declare that from and after a day to be therein mentioned the country known as Pondoland, comprising the territories of East and West Pondoland, should be annexed to and form part of the colony, in case the legislature of the colony should have passed an Act providing that the said country should become part of the colony, it was enacted as follows :

G "1. From and after such day as the Governor shall, pursuant to the powers in that behalf contained in any Royal Letters Patent which may be issued for that purpose by proclamation under his hand and the public seal of the colony, fix in that behalf the country in the preamble to this Act mentioned and with the name of Pondoland shall be annexed to and become part of the colony.

H 2. From and after the date of such proclamation as aforesaid the territory known as East Pondoland shall become a part of that portion of the colony known as Griqualand East, and the territory known as West Pondoland shall become a part of that portion of the colony known as Tembuland, and the same territories shall be subject to such laws, statutes, and ordinances as have already been proclaimed by the High Commissioner, and such as after the annexation of the colony the Governor shall from time to time by proclamation declare to be in force in such territories. Provided always that all such laws made under or by virtue of this Act shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within fourteen days after the beginning of the session of Parliament next after the proclamation thereof as aforesaid, and shall be effectual unless in so far as the same shall be repealed, altered, or varied by Act of Parliament."

I On Sept. 4, 1894, a proclamation was made and issued under the Act, declaring that the territory of Eastern Pondoland, with the adjoining territory of Western Pondoland, should be annexed to and form part of the Cape Colony, and Eastern Pondoland has thenceforward been part of the colony.

The appellants commenced their action in the Supreme Court, under the Crown Liabilities Act, 1888, by summons against the Hon. Cecil John Rhodes, then Prime Minister of Cape Colony, whereby they claimed a declaration of their alleged rights under the respective four documents, and £5,000 as damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of the prevention of their exercising their alleged rights. The action was tried before the Supreme Court in March, 1895, and judgment was given as hereinbefore stated. The appellants obtained leave to appeal. In 1896 the respondent became the Prime Minister of Cape Colony in place of the Hon. Cecil John Rhodes, and by order of the Supreme Court the respondent was substituted in these proceedings for the Hon. Cecil John Rhodes, and he represented the government of the colony.

Aug. 1, 1899. THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an appeal from the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope, wherein judgment was given for the defendant. The action is brought against the Prime Minister of the colony in his official capacity under the powers of an Act of the Parliament of the Cape of Good Hope intituled the Crown Liabilities Act, 1888, which permits such an action to be brought in terms hereafter to be referred to.

The case made on behalf of the plaintiffs was that certain agreements or concessions were made by a native chief, described as "Paramount Chief of Pondoland," granting certain privileges and rights to the appellants. It appears to be established by proof that the appellants never in fact obtained possession of the lands or exercised the rights which these documents purported to convey, but it is argued that some effort was made to search for "graphite" in pursuance of these documents. A considerable amount of evidence appears to have been given with the object of showing that the rights purported to be granted were contrary to the native laws and customs prevailing in Pondoland at the time when they purported to be granted; that Sigean was a lawless despot; and that any rights purporting to be granted by him were subject to his arbitrary power to recall them at any moment. And, further, that Sigean did not understand the meaning or object of the documents which he was supposed to execute. Their Lordships do not differ with the finding of fact by the Chief Justice that at the time that Sigean executed the instruments in question he was the paramount chief of the Pondos, and that Sigean understood perfectly well that he was purporting to grant such rights as the instruments which he executed professed to convey. Their Lordships do not think it material to enter into such questions, inasmuch as they are of opinion that the statute which gives a power to sue the Prime Minister does not involve the power of making any declaration of right in such a case. And as mere matter of form it does not contain any clause empowering the court to make a declaration of right as against the Crown; but there is a more complete answer to any claim arising from these instruments.

The taking possession by Her Majesty, whether by cession or by any other means by which sovereignty can be acquired, was an act of State, and treating Sigean as an independent sovereign—which the appellants are compelled to do in deriving title from him—it is a well-established principle of law that the transactions of independent States between each other are governed by other laws than those which municipal courts administer. It is no answer to say that by the ordinary principles of international law private property is respected by the sovereign which accepts the cession and assumes the duties and legal obligations of the former sovereign with respect to such private property within the ceded territory. All that can be properly meant by such a proposition is that according to the well-understood rules of international law a change of sovereignty by cession ought not to affect private property, but no municipal tribunal has authority to enforce such an obligation. And if there is either an express or a well-understood bargain between the ceding potentate and

A the government to which the cession is made that private property shall be respected, that is only a bargain which can be enforced by sovereign against sovereign in the ordinary course of diplomatic pressure.

B In this case it certainly cannot be said that there was any bargain by the British government that Sigcau's supposed concessions should be recognised. Indeed, the only intelligible sense in which the allegations in the declaration can be understood is that the breach of duty complained of consists in the refusal of the Cape government to recognise the appellants' concessions. To quote the language of this Board used by LORD KINGSDOWN in Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamachee Boye Sahaba (1) (13 Moo. P.C.C. at p. 86) and cited in Doss v. Secretary of State for India in Council (2) (L.R. 19 Eq. at p. 534):

C "Of the propriety or justice of that act [here the refusal to recognise] neither the court below nor the Judicial Committee have the means of forming, or the right of expressing if they had formed, any opinion. It may have been just or unjust, politic or impolitic, beneficial or injurious, taken as a whole, to those whose interests are affected. These are considerations into which their Lordships cannot enter. It is sufficient to say that, even if a wrong has been done, it is a wrong for which no municipal court of justice can afford a remedy."

D At the same time their Lordships are by no means prepared to differ from the observation of the Chief Justice that the appellants "have strong claims to the favourable consideration of the government and Parliament of the country." Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed, the parties on each side to pay their own costs.

May 24, 1898. STIRLING, J., read the following judgment.—The question which arises on this summons is as to the payment out of the real estate of the testator of the costs of the plaintiff in the probate action. The testator made a will dated April 1, 1895, as to the terms of which I shall say a word in a moment. On May 29, 1896, the testator died. On Nov. 19, 1896, the will was proved in solemn form by the executors. On Jan. 15, 1897, the widow of the testator commenced an action, and I have thought it right, in the circumstances of the case, to see the pleadings and ascertain exactly the nature of the case which she raised. She alleges that the defendants, who are the executors, obtained probate in solemn form, that the alleged will was not duly executed, that the deceased at the time of the execution of the will did not approve of the contents and that he at the time when the will purports to be executed was not of sound memory and understanding. She claims that the court should pronounce against the will of April 1, 1895, revoke the grant of probate and decree probate of a will dated June 10, 1891. The defendants put in a defence in which they denied the various allegations and claimed that the court should pronounce against the will set up by the plaintiff and decree probate in solemn form of the will of 1895. The case came on to be heard on Nov. 19, 20 and 22, 1897, so that the trial of it ran over I do not say the whole, but, at any rate part of three days. The result was that the judge pronounced on Nov. 22, 1897, for the force and validity of the last will and testament of the testator [viz., the will dated April 1, 1895] and ordered the costs of both parties to be paid out of the estate, and the probate of the will to be handed to the defendants.

The result has been—there being a very small personal estate—that the personal estate was exhausted in the payment of the costs of the executors, and the question

A now is whether the widow, the plaintiff in this action, is entitled to payment of any costs out of the real estate? It was admitted upon the argument before me and according to the authorities it is quite clear that the order of the Court of Probate on Nov. 22, 1897, affected only the personal estate of the testator. It will hereafter have to be borne in mind that the Land Transfer Act, 1897, which came into operation on Jan. 1, 1898, has made alterations in that respect and that the Court of Probate, as I understand, has now jurisdiction to deal with the realty as well as the personality of the estate. However, that is not the point which arises in the present case. The testator devised all the residue of his real estate and the residue of his personal estate subject to the payment of all mortgages and encumbrances and subject to the payment of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses to his children, and he authorised and empowered his executors to raise by mortgage of his real estate any sum which might be necessary for the purposes of his estate and for the payment of the legacies. The question is whether the costs of the plaintiff in that probate action can be paid out of the real estate as "testamentary expenses"?

This court has certainly not drawn a very narrow line as regards the meaning of testamentary expenses, and I have no wish to do anything to narrow the definition which the expression "testamentary expenses" has received in this court. It has been held that where an action has been properly brought by an executor or administrator for the administration of personal estate, and the proper parties appear, the costs both of the executor and of the defendants are, in a proper case testamentary expenses within the meaning of such a will as this. Moreover it is not necessary that the action for administration or for getting the direction of the court should be brought by the executors. The same thing applies if the person beneficially entitled comes here as plaintiff and asks that directions may be given to the executors for the proper administration of the estate, and, although I have not been referred to any case which defines the meaning of testamentary expenses as regards an action in the Probate Court, I should be sorry to lay down any very narrow definition with regard to it: for example, if there were an action brought by the executor properly for probate of the will in solemn form in which it was necessary to summon various parties who might be interested in disputing the validity of the will, and if those parties appeared and contented themselves with simply cross-examining the plaintiffs' witnesses or producing such further evidence as might in the judgment of the court be proper in order to enable the court to arrive at a proper determination whether the will ought to be proved in solemn form or no I should not be willing to say, if the Court of Probate said these were proper costs to be paid out of the personal estate, that they were not also, or might not be testamentary expenses within the meaning of such a will as this. Again, even if the step was not taken by the executor but by some one interested in upholding the will and it was considered by the Court of Probate that it was a reasonable course for the upholding of the will, although the step was not taken by the executor but by another person, I should be unwilling to hold that necessarily on that ground the plaintiff in the action would be excluded from the benefit of the disposition of the real estate under which the testamentary expenses were charged on the property.

But what I find here is that the plaintiff in the probate action comes challenging the will and disputing the will, and it is not a mere mode of getting the decision of the court upon the validity of the will by requiring the will to be proved in solemn form, but there was a contest,—as I have ascertained from the learned judge who tried the case—there was a serious contest raised by this lady as to the validity of the will. That the costs of the executors were testamentary expenses appears to me to be beyond controversy, they are costs properly incurred in upholding the will which is the will of the testator. On the other hand, these costs, or at all events the bulk of them—and they are very considerable—were incurred by the plaintiff in contesting the will, in asserting that it was a will which ought not to be recognised as the will of the testator, and it does not appear to me, A however wide the definition of testamentary expenses may be, that those costs ought to be included. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff's application for payment of the costs out of the real estate fails.

Will—Trust—Referential trusts—Construction against multiplication of charges. E

By his will, dated Nov. 29, 1887, the testator, who died on the same day, gave the whole of his estate to trustees on trust (a) to pay the income thereof up to £20,000 to his wife for life so long as she remained a widow; (b) on her re-marriage, to pay the income arising from £10,000 to her for life; (c) on her death, to pay the income arising from the £20,000 for the maintenance, education and advancement of all or any of his children; (d) in the event of his wife's re-marriage to apply the interest of the balance of the £20,000 on the trusts lastly declared; (e) subject to the aforesaid trusts, to pay to each of his children who should attain twenty-one or marry, one half of the capital sum devised on trust; (f) out of the residue, to pay £10,000 to his brother; (g) the ultimate residue to be held on the trusts thereinbefore declared with reference to the sum of £20,000. The testator was survived by his two children and his widow who subsequently re-married. The ultimate residue amounted to about £34,000 and the wife contended that on her re-marriage she was by cl. (g) entitled for life to the income either of the whole of the ultimate residuary estate or at least of an additional sum of £10,000, but it was contended for the children that she was entitled to the income of only one sum of £10,000.

Held: in the absence of a clear intention shown in the will, a trust in a will created by reference to other trusts ought not to be read so as to make a multiplication of trusts in the nature of charges; and, there being no such intention shown in the will, the court would not impute one; accordingly, the widow on her re-marriage was entitled to the income of only one sum of £10,000 and not to any share in the ultimate residue. H

Appeal by the testator's widow in an administration suit against a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (DARLEY, C.J., and FOSTER, J., MANNING, J., dissenting), affirming a decision of the Chief Judge in Equity (OWEN, J.).

The suit was brought for the administration of the will of Louis Samuel, deceased, and the question in dispute was as to the interest which the appellant, who was the widow of the testator, took under the will upon her re-marriage. The respondents were a trustee company, and the testator's two children.

Warrington, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins for the respondents.

Feb. 23, 1895. LORD HOBHOUSE delivered the following judgment of the court.—This is a suit for the administration of the estate of Louis Samuel, who died on Nov. 29, 1887, having made a will on the day of his death. The appellant, now Mrs. Trew, was his wife. The respondents are his two children and a company appointed to be trustees of his will. The matter in question is the amount of interest given by the will to the appellant.

The testator first gave his whole estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert it into money. It will conduce to clearness if his directions as to the application of the money, which in the will are written consecutively, are now quoted as separate clauses :

F

“(a) To pay the income of so much thereof as shall amount to the sum of £20,000 to my wife, Mary Ruth Samuel, during her life and so long as she shall remain my widow for her sole and separate use, free from the control of any husband. (b) And from and immediately after her marrying again in trust to pay the income arising from £10,000 to my . . . wife for her life, free from the control of any future husband as aforesaid. (c) And from and immediately after the death of my . . . wife to pay the income arising from the . . . £20,000 for the maintenance and education and advancement of all and any children of mine by my . . . wife, whether born or to be born hereafter. (d) And in the event of my . . . wife marrying again to apply the interest of the balance of the £20,000 upon the trusts last hereinbefore declared. (e) And I further declare that the trustees shall, subject to the aforesaid trusts, pay to each of my . . . children upon their attaining the age of twenty-one years, or upon their or either of their marriage, one half of the capital sum hereinbefore devised upon trust. (f) As to the residue of my . . . estate [he gave £10,000 to his brother Edward]. (g) And as to all my residuary estate I give and bequeath the same upon the trusts hereinbefore declared with reference to the sum of £20,000.”

H

I

The ultimate residue was large. It was stated by the appellant to amount to £34,000 or thereabouts. Her contention is that by virtue of cl. (g) she is entitled for life to the income either of the whole residuary estate, or at least of an additional sum of £10,000. For the children it is contended that on her second marriage she became entitled to no more than the income of one sum of £10,000. The case was heard before the Chief Justice in Equity, who declared that the appellant was entitled, in the events which had happened, to the income arising from £10,000, part of the estate of the said testator, during her life, and was not entitled to any further interest under the will. She appealed to the full court, who dismissed the appeal, MANNING, J., dissenting from his colleagues. She now seeks to reverse A those adverse decrees.

It has hardly been contended before their Lordships that the lady is entitled to the first alternative of her claim—viz., the moiety of the whole residue—but it was strongly urged that she is entitled to a second sum of £10,000 for her life. Their Lordships pass over the conjectures made as to the intentions of the testator not expressed in words. The will shows marks of hasty construction; but it is consistent enough with itself, and on the point in question its literal construction presents no great difficulty. On the literal construction the argument pressed in favour of the appellant is, to use the words of MANNING, J., that where there is a trust by reference B

Then it is said, that if the words “residue of my estate” be written in where the words “£20,000” occur, that would carry to the widow the income of £10,000 on her re-marriage. But, in the first place, their Lordships cannot accept the proposed canon of construction in any sense which would give to it the general effect of multiplying charges upon the trust estate, or trusts in the nature of charges. Of course such may be the intention or effect of a particular will. But in the absence of anything in the will to show such an intention the rule is that the court will not impute it to the testator. In Hindle v. Taylor (1) LORD CRANWORTH held that in almost all cases it was not a reasonable way of reading a trust created by reference to other trusts to consider everything as there repeated, and so make a duplication, as it were, of trusts in the nature of charges. That opinion has been recognised as sound in subsequent cases. That in this case the widow’s interest after re-marriage is in the nature of a charge hardly admits of dispute. D E

In the second place, even supposing that the suggested process were applied to this will, their Lordships cannot see how the appellant makes out her right to a second sum of £10,000. Let the residue be substituted for “£20,000” as suggested, cl. (a) would then carry the income of the residue to the widow, but only pending widowhood. Clause (b) does not relate to the £20,000, but to a substituted sum of £10,000. Clause (c) would give the income of the residue to the children at the death of the widow. Clause (d) would give the income of the balance of the residue to the children after the marriage of the widow. Clause (e) would give them at twenty-one or marriage one-half of the capital of the residue. It is one of the inaccuracies of the will that there is no express gift of the other half. It has probably been assumed by everybody that the gift of the whole income and an accelerated gift of half the capital implies that the whole capital is intended to be given ultimately. In all these prior provisions there is no gift to the widow after re-marriage, except in cl. (b), and that is not expressed to be one of the trusts of the £20,000. There is no trust declared of “the £20,000” as a whole in favour of the widow after her second marriage. For the appellant it is contended that such a trust is implied in cl. (d) by the expression “balance of the £20,000.” No doubt the widow’s £10,000 will have to be answered out of the £20,000, or out of the bulk of the estate, before any residue can be ascertained. Her interest is made to come first; and “the balance of the £20,000” means that part as to which no direction is given after the direction regarding the £10,000. But it seems somewhat fanciful to say that the introduction of cl. (d) into the residuary gift would amount to a direction that another sum of £10,000 is to be taken out of the residue and added to that which is alone given to the widow by cl. (b) on her re-marriage. F G H I

That is what their Lordships find to be the result of actual introduction of the prior clauses into the residuary gift. If on the whole will there were any sufficient indication of an intention that the widow should on re-marriage take two sums of £10,000 effect could doubtless be given to it, though it might not be expressed in precise terms. But, as above observed, there is no such indication; the appellant is relying on the strictest literal construction, and that is found not to be in her favour. The result is that the judgment below ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed. The courts below have thought fit to charge upon the estate the costs of the two former hearings. But it would hardly be right to burden the estate with the costs of a second fruitless appeal, and their Lordships must order the appellant to pay the costs. They will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

Re NICKELS. NICKELS v. NICKELS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), March 30, 31, 1898]

By his will the testator settled the residue of his estate in equal shares in trust for his six children, namely five sons and one daughter, and their children. There was special power to advance each son one-half of his share, but there was no such power in respect of the daughter's share although under a general power in the will the trustees were entitled to advance to her one-third of her share. In 1881, in exercise of these powers, the trustees advanced each son one-half of his share and advanced to the daughter one-sixth of her share. In order to put the daughter and her children on an equal footing the trustees in the same year allotted certain stock to the daughter which at the then market values made up one moiety of the one-sixth share to which the daughter and her children were entitled. An account reading "Stocks allotted to Mrs. Morton [the testator's daughter]" was opened by the trustees regarding this stock and the allotment was recognised and referred to in accounts rendered by subsequent trustees down to the daughter's death. Moreover, during her life the daughter received the income from the stocks, and advances out of the corpus were from time to time made to her children. At the date of the daughter's death in 1896 the stock had materially increased in value. The trustees proposed to distribute the daughter's share to her children.

Held: the trustees in 1881 were entitled to appropriate, and had validly appropriated, the stock to the daughter's share, and the distribution to her children should be made on that footing.

Originating Summons taken out by the trustees of the will of Christopher Nickels deceased to determine (i) whether the trustees had power to sever the trust premises into divided sixth parts prior to the period for division of the estate, and (ii) if so, whether any appropriation had been made in the year 1881.

By his will made in 1859 the testator gave his real and personal property to trustees on trust for sale and conversion and to invest the proceeds of sale. As to a one-sixth part of the trust funds the trustees were directed to hold such parts on trust to accumulate one-half of the income thereof for twenty-one years and as to the other half of the income, during the period of twenty-one years, and after the expiration of that period as to the whole of the income, on trust to pay the same to the testator's son Edward Nickels during his life, subject to certain trusts, and after his death on trust to pay the income to his widow, and after her death on trust as to both capital and income of the one-sixth part, in trust for the children of Edward Nickels when they should attain twenty-one. The will gave the trustees discretionary power to apply moneys for the maintenance and advancement of Edward Nickels' children, such advancement not to exceed one-half of the principal of the presumptive share of any child. The trustees were also empowered in their discretion to place any portion of the one-sixth share, not exceeding one-half thereof, at the disposal of Edward Nickels. The will contained similar trusts of other one-sixth parts of the trust funds in favour of the testator's other four sons, George Nickels, Charles Nickels, Henry Nickels and Walter Nickels, and their respective widows and children. The remaining one-sixth part of the funds was given on similar trusts as to accumulation and payment of income to the testator's daughter, Elizabeth Amelia Morton, for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death in trust for her children with a similar power, as in the case of the children of the testator's sons, to apply moneys for their maintenance and advancement; but with regard to the daughter's share there was no special power to place any portion of it at her disposal. There was however a general power in the will empowering the trustees

"To apply any portion not exceeding one-third part of the share or respectively shares of the said trust estates, funds and premises to the income of which any of my said six children or their children respectively shall be entitled for or towards the putting him, her, or them respectively in any business, or otherwise advancing him, her, or them in the world, in the discretion of my said trustees or trustee for the time being, anything in this my will to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding."

The testator died in 1860 leaving his six children surviving him, some of whom married and had issue who on the death of their respective parents became entitled under the trusts to the principal and income of their respective parents' one-sixth share.

In or about the year 1881, after the expiration of twenty-one years from the testator's death, the then trustees of the will, in exercise of the special powers contained in the will, applied for the benefit of each of the five sons a sum equivalent to one-half of the one-sixth share of each son; and in exercise of the general power in the will the trustees applied for the benefit of the daughter a sum equivalent to one-sixth of her one-sixth share. Subsequently, in the same year, the trustees set aside £1,053 London, Chatham and Dover four-and-a-half per cent. debentures and £300 London and Greenwich five-and-a-half per cent. ordinary stock and paid the income thereof to the testator's daughter during her life. As appeared from the cash books an account was opened by the trustees with respect of these stocks which, after setting out the advances made to the daughter's children, read "Stocks allotted to Mrs. Morton to balance remaining two-thirds set aside for her children, 300 London and Greenwich  $5\frac{1}{2}$  at £216; 1,053 London, Chatham and Dover  $4\frac{1}{2}$  at £1,284 13. 3d.; total £1,500 13. 3d." In subsequent accounts rendered down to the daughter's death in 1896 that allotment of stock was recognised and referred to, and the income from the stocks was paid to the daughter during her life and advances were made to her children, under the general power in the will, out of the corpus.

The plaintiffs, the present trustees of the will, now proposed to distribute the residue of the one-sixth share given to the testator's daughter among her children and their respective assigns on the basis of the present value of the securities, stocks and shares subject to the trusts of the will. The daughter had died on Nov. 7, 1896, leaving five children surviving her, one of whom had assigned his share in the trust funds to the defendant Alfred Ross Clyne. The question arose whether there had been any valid appropriation of specific portions of the trust funds to answer the one-sixth share given to the daughter and her children. It was contended on behalf of the daughter's children that the London, Chatham and Dover debentures were set aside for their benefit and they were absolutely entitled to them. On behalf of the testator's other children it was contended that no complete appropriation had been made by the transaction in 1881 and that the then trustees had no power to make such an appropriation which would result in a distribution greatly to the prejudice and disadvantage of the testator's other children.

Gatey for the defendant Luther Nickels, a son of Edward Nickels.

Stewart Smith for the defendant Elizabeth A. Baker, a daughter of Mrs. Morton.

Buckmaster for the defendant Alfred Ross Clyne.

STIRLING, J.-- The question that arises on this summons is whether the trustees of the will of the testator made an effectual appropriation of part of the testator's estate towards a particular share of that estate. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The first question is, whether in point of fact there was then [viz., in 1881] made an irrevocable appropriation on the part of the trustees. What is suggested on behalf of the present trustees, and on behalf of the children entitled to the other five-sixths, is that this was a mere book-keeping arrangement in order to avoid any question as to what rate of interest has to be charged on the advances made to Mrs. Morton and her children. It seems to me that that is not a sufficient explanation of what was done and of the entries made. If it was a mere book-keeping entry that might be, but it has been acted upon, and if the appropriation was not made or intended Mrs. Morton and the other children have ever since that time been receiving the income on a wrong footing. The income of these appropriations has been applied to Mrs. Morton. That could not be right if it was not meant as an effective appropriation, whether she got too much or too little does not matter, the other parties have conversely received too little or too much. The fund has been dealt with on that footing ever since the year 1881, and it seems to me upon the evidence the trustees did mean in the year 1881 to make a final and complete appropriation of this stock and of these shares, and that no explanation suggested in this case is adequate to account for what they did both in their books and by their acts.

Then comes the question, is this appropriation one which the trustees were entitled to make? There is no question raised here as to the bona fides of the transaction. It was done in perfect good faith, and the sole question is whether it was within the power of the testator's trustees. No authority has been cited to show it was not. What has been relied upon is a statement in Mr. LEWIN's well-known book where this is said (LEWIN ON TRUSTS (9th Edn.), p. 667):

“Where the residue consists of a great variety of securities the question arises whether the trustees, in the absence of any special power, can virtute officii where infants are concerned divide the residue by apportioning some securities to another, but so that the distribution is a fair one according to the market price of the day of the funds so appropriated. The court can make such apportionment, for in a suit guardians ad litem of the infants are appointed and are heard on their behalf to protect their interests, but out of court, where the voice of the infants cannot be heard, it would be unsafe for trustees to make such apportionment on their own responsibility. However, where trustees are directed to invest the infant's share on any particular securities they might accept securities of the value prescribed at the market price, as the transaction when resolved would be the payment of so much money and the investment of it by the trustees in the requisite securities. Where there are no special powers the trustees should turn the whole of the irregular species of property into money and divide the proceeds.”

That is merely a statement to this effect, that the trustees where there is no express power would not act wisely in making an appropriation without getting the sanction of the court. That is very sound advice for a conveyancer to give to a trustee who was about to act by making an appropriation, but the question is, Supposing he does it, is it bad? and MR. LEWIN does not say so. He says the court can make such an appropriation, and that seems to me to imply that it is within the power of the trustee to make it, because the court has no power to alter the rights of parties and property. It has simply power to administer trusts.

Beyond that there are two cases which I agree do not in point of decision govern the present case, but at all events go a long way to support the view which is contended for, namely, that the trustees have power in a proper case to make such an appropriation. The first is Re Lepine (1). I do not propose to deal with the specific facts, but LINDLEY, L.J., dealing with the case says this ([1892] 1 Ch. at p. 215):

“One of the persons entitled to one-sixth was a person who was of age and capable of entering into an agreement with the executor as to how he would take his sixth; and instead of taking it in cash, he and the executor agree together that he should take a mortgage for £700 in part payment of his legacy. Assuming for the moment that there were assets, and that the £700 in addition to what he got in cash or other securities did not exceed the amount due to him, what is there amiss with that? What is there to prevent the trustee or the executor making such a transaction? It is said that he cannot do it. . . .”

So that it is there laid down that, where one legatee comes and wants payment of his share, the executor or trustee, without the assent of the persons entitled to the other shares, may take a specific asset and hand it over at a proper value to that legatee. Then FRY, L.J., says (ibid., at p. 218):

“Supposing an executor or trustee divides the estate in such a manner as that he gives to one legatee or cestui que trust property or securities worth twenty shillings in the pound, and he gives to another rubbish and trash which is not worth its nominal value, or the value at which he takes it, I have no doubt that such trustee or executor is guilty of a breach of trust, and that any legatee who takes the good securities, with notice of what has been done, may be made liable for that breach of trust.”

He does not say that the executors, acting fairly, may not divide the property in the proper shares between the legatees. The subsequent case of Re Richardson (2) was before NORTH, J. There there was an appropriation by executors to themselves of a certain portion of the property, although certain of the shares were settled, and although there was no corresponding appropriation in respect of the settled shares, and NORTH, J., makes this remark ([1896] 1 Ch. at p. 516):

A "It has been suggested that there could be no appropriation of this stock to the daughters' share till the final division. I do not assent to that. I have heard no authority and see no reason for such proposition. I see no reason why if part of the estate can be distributed before the final division, it should not be distributed among all the shares, proper investments being appropriated to the trust shares without waiting for the final division."

B What happened in the present case was that in effect the sons got a division of one-half of their share, and in order to put the daughter and her children on an equal footing with the sons, there being no power to make over an equal amount to the daughter and her children in cash they put apart a fair amount of the estate to put the daughter and her children on the same footing as the sons. It seems to me, having done that, in fact it was within their power to do it, and I think, therefore, the appropriation was good.

Appeal from a decision of WRIGHT, J., at the trial in Middlesex and an interpleader issue directed to be tried between the plaintiffs, Messrs. Shears, and the defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy of one, Mrs. Sills, as to the right to a sum of £377 in the hands of Ward, the owner of a horse repository. B

The plaintiffs, who were cab proprietors, purchased on May 25, 1895, from Mrs. Sills, another cab proprietor, her horses and cabs for £300, and paid her £150 in gold and £150 by cheque. She returned them the cheque and they gave her cash instead. On the same day Mrs. Sills disappeared. On May 27 the plaintiffs removed the horses and cabs to Ward's repository, where they were sold on the following day and realised £377 net. On June 20 a receiving order was made against Mrs. Sills, which stated as the acts of bankruptcy committed by her that she had, on May 25, with intent to defeat or delay her creditors, departed from her dwelling-house, and on the same day made a fraudulent delivery or transfer of her property, or some part thereof, to the plaintiffs. She had not committed any prior act of bankruptcy. Mrs. Sills was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the defendant, her trustee in bankruptcy, claimed the sum of £377, which still remained in the hands of Ward. The plaintiffs contended that there was a bona fide purchase for value without notice of any prior act of bankruptcy committed by Mrs. Sills, and that the transaction was protected by s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. C D

WRIGHT, J., found that the plaintiffs had made a bona fide purchase for value without notice of any fraudulent intent on the part of the bankrupt; and held that the transaction was protected by s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed. E

Witt, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the defendant.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Duke, for the plaintiffs, were not called on to argue. F

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This case has been very elaborately argued, and a great deal has been said about what was the law before the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and about the general law of bankruptcy. The bankruptcy law is always the creation of statute, and, as a general rule, each succeeding statute has swept away those which preceded it. Since the decisions which have been cited, the legislature has passed the present statute, and we have to determine what is the law of bankruptcy under this statute. G

This statute contains s. 49. That section was meant to protect innocent people from the consequences of acts which would otherwise leave them unprotected; that is, to protect innocent people who have parted with their money and paid for a conveyance or for goods. Such are to be protected where they have given valuable consideration, which need not be money, for that which it is sought to take away from them. Let us see, then, what this statute does provide. Section 49 is as follows: H

"Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate in the case of a bankruptcy, . . . (d) any contract, dealing or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely, (1) The . . . contract, dealing or transaction . . . takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) the person (other than the debtor) . . . with whom the contract, dealing or transaction was made . . . has not at the time of the . . . contract, dealing or transaction notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time." I

A I think that it is impossible for words to be more plain than those are. We have, then, to see whether this case comes within those words.

B The argument for the defendant has attempted to evade the provisions of s. 49 by reading a whole sentence into the section. That is contrary to every rule of construction in connection with Acts of Parliament, to add something to a statute not necessary to explain it. Taking the words, then, in their ordinary sense, is this case within the section? According to the finding of WRIGHT, J., the plaintiffs did enter into a dealing with the bankrupt before the date of the receiving order. At the time of that dealing they had no notice of, and knew nothing of, any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time; there was, in fact, no such act of bankruptcy. If they had known at the time of the dealing that it was an act of bankruptcy, and that it was an attempt to defraud creditors, it would not have been a bona fide transaction. They would have been parties to a fraudulent transaction and would not have been protected by s. 49. But, when a man has had such a dealing as this with a bankrupt, it is within the very words of the Act of Parliament, and he is protected by s. 49. That is justice to an innocent man; the contrary would be most unjust to an innocent man.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the legislature intended what it has said in plain words, and that the meaning of the section is a fair and honest meaning which avoids a gross injustice to an innocent person who has paid his money bona fide. That is the true meaning of s. 49, and any other decisions upon previous Acts have nothing to do with it. The judgment of WRIGHT, J., must be upheld, and this appeal dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A person, who was the owner of certain cabs and horses and was in business as a cab proprietor, entered into a transaction with the plaintiffs, and sold to them a number of horses for £300. The plaintiffs then re-sold the horses. WRIGHT, J., had all the facts before him, and he came to the conclusion that, although the vendor had committed a fraud upon her creditors, the plaintiffs had no knowledge of such conduct and were innocent purchasers. I think that he was justified in coming to that conclusion.

It is now contended that the transaction is not protected by the provisions of s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; that the transaction, being itself an act of bankruptcy, is not protected by s. 49. I cannot think that that is a sound argument. In order to decide this question we must look only at the terms of this Act of Parliament, and not at those of previous Acts. Looking at the provisions of s. 49 it is perfectly clear that this transaction comes within the section. In this case the act of bankruptcy was one created by s. 4 (1) (b). That is very material when we come to consider the provisions of s. 49, which says that "nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy," certain transactions. Those words beyond all question include the act of bankruptcy created by s. 4, which relates to the present transaction. It was a transaction for valuable consideration, and it cannot be said that there was anything suspicious about it, so far as the purchasers were concerned. It took place before the date of the receiving order. At that time the plaintiffs had no notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt; they could not have had such notice, because there was no previous act of bankruptcy. Every condition of s. 49 has been complied with, and the transaction, though itself an act of bankruptcy, is protected by the section.

A case has been cited which was decided under the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, where PARKE, B., said (2 E. & B. at pp. 39, 40):

"If the transaction is itself an act of bankruptcy, it is not protected, though there is no notice of the act of bankruptcy to those claiming under it:"

Smith v. Cannan (1). The words of that statute were entirely different from those of the present statute; the words there were only "notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy." We have not to decide this case under the words of that statute.

Perhaps the words in s. 49 of the present Act have been made different in order to meet cases of that kind. I think, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed. A

RIGBY, L.J.—Two questions, which are entirely distinct, are raised in this case, one of fact and the other of law. As to the question of fact, I have very little to say. The learned judge did not disbelieve the evidence of the plaintiffs, and that disposes of the question of fact. Then, as to the question of law. It has been argued that we ought to read words into the Act of Parliament, and not simply construe the words as they stand. It is clear that the words “nothing in this Act shall invalidate,” in s. 49, as far as their literal interpretation goes, include this case. There are some express exceptions in the section, i.e., executions, attachments, settlements, and preferences. The absolute generality of the succeeding words “nothing in this Act” is clearly shown by those express exceptions. Certain transactions are included in the section, which are not to be invalidated by anything in the Act, in case of bankruptcy. That protection is given subject to two conditions, that the transaction must take place before the date of the receiving order, and without notice of any previous available act of bankruptcy. B

We have no right to alter the provisions of the section, and it follows that the protection of the section is given to the present transaction. The cases which have been cited were decided upon different statutes, the words of which were different from those of this Act. The words in those Acts were “notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy.” The interpretation to be put upon those decisions is, that the provisions of the old Acts were to be read as being equivalent to saying only that transactions were not to be invalidated by a prior act of bankruptcy. There is nothing in the present Act of Parliament to support a similar interpretation. This Act of Parliament says that, with certain exceptions, nothing which is made invalid by the Act shall be invalid in certain cases and under certain conditions. In s. 49 a transaction for valuable consideration means a bona fide transaction for any valuable consideration, and does not include any fraudulent transaction. It must be clear that the transaction in question is really that which it appears to be, and that the person who has dealt with the bankrupt for valuable consideration has really and bona fide so dealt with him. Whether or not, but for the provisions of s. 49, this transaction would be invalidated by the previous sections, the protection of s. 49 is given to this transaction. I agree that the appeal fails and must be dismissed. E

Re OTWAY. Ex parte OTWAY

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), March 15, 1895]

[Reported [1895] 1 Q.B. 812; 64 L.J.Q.B. 521; 72 L.T. 452;

B Bankruptcy—Petition—Dismissal—“Other sufficient cause” for dismissal—Attempt to extort money by petitioning creditor—Destruction of debtor’s only asset by bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 7 (3).

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 7 (3): “If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor’s debt, or of the act of bankruptcy, or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition.”

The creditor presented a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor consequent on the debtor’s non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice in respect of a judgment debt of £128 owed by the debtor. Thereafter the debtor became entitled to a life interest under a trust, subject to forfeiture on bankruptcy, which was his only asset. The creditor asked the debtor for £25 as the price of his consent to an adjournment, but the debtor refused. On a further adjournment made by the registrar a receiving order was made. On appeal by the debtor,

Held: as the creditor’s attempt to extort money from the debtor amounted to fraudulent conduct, and as destruction of the debtor’s only asset would result from proceeding with the bankruptcy, each was a “sufficient cause” within
s. 7 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for dismissal of the petition, and, therefore, the receiving order would be rescinded.

Notes. Section 7 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been repealed and replaced by s. 5 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (2 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 334).

Appeal by the debtor against a receiving order made by the registrar.

The petitioning creditor, Moore, having obtained a final judgment against the debtor for £128 for money lent, thereupon served on him a bankruptcy notice.
Upon non-compliance therewith by the debtor, the petitioning creditor presented a petition in bankruptcy against him on Oct. 24, 1894. After the presentation of the petition the debtor became entitled to a life interest in certain trust funds which, by the terms of the trust, would be forfeited if he became bankrupt or alienated. This was the only asset of the debtor. The hearing of the petition was adjourned to Dec. 12, 1894. On that date the petitioning creditor told the debtor that he would consent to a further adjournment if the debtor would give him £25, and asked him to give that sum. The debtor refused. The hearing was further adjourned by the registrar and at this adjourned hearing a receiving order was made.

Muir Mackenzie for the debtor.

F. Cooper Willis for the petitioning creditor.

LORD ESHER, M.R. On both points I think that the order was not a proper one. The sum of £25 was asked by the petitioning creditor from the debtor as the price of an adjournment. Re Atkinson, Ex parte Atkinson (1) says that that is fraudulent conduct on the part of a petitioning creditor. On that ground the petitioning creditor ought not to be allowed to go on with his petition. A

As to the other point, Re Robinson, Ex parte Robinson (2) seems to show clearly that it would be doing merely a "vain thing" to make a receiving order in a case like this, and that, therefore, a receiving order ought not to be made. Here it is clear that, if the debtor is made a bankrupt, the only asset of the debtor would upon bankruptcy be put an end to and destroyed. In such circumstances the case comes within the words of s. 7 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, B and may properly refuse to make a receiving order. This order ought not to have been made, and the appeal must be allowed.

"... if the court is . . . satisfied that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition," C

LOPES, L.J. I am of the same opinion. No receiving order ought to have been made. Both points made by the debtor are good. If the petition is used as a means of extorting, or endeavouring to extort, money, a receiving order ought not to be made upon that petition. I think that that objection is made out in this case. The petitioning creditor has nothing to gain by a bankruptcy, but on the contrary will get nothing. I think that the petitioning creditor was proceeding in the hope of squeezing money out of the debtor or his relations. I am of opinion that, upon that ground, the receiving order ought not to have been made. Re Atkinson, Ex parte Atkinson (1) is an authority for that. I am of the same opinion also upon the other ground. An adjudication in this case would be useless; it would be doing a "vain thing," as said in Re Robinson, Ex parte Robinson (2) by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. The debtor's only asset would be forfeited upon bankruptcy, and the creditors would get nothing. I am, therefore, of opinion that a receiving order ought not to have been made, and that the appeal must succeed. D E F

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that a fraud was attempted by the petitioning creditor in making his request for £25 from the debtor. On that ground I think that the receiving order ought not to have been made. On another ground also the order ought not to have been made. The debtor has no other asset except one which would be destroyed by bankruptcy. G

Re RUSSELL. DORRELL v. DORRELL

44 W.R. 100; 12 R. 499]

Perpetuities—Will—Gift to the daughters of testator's niece—Direction to settle share of such daughter—Daughter living at death of testator—Validity although birth of other daughters possible after testator's death.

The testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees on trust for his niece for life and on her death for her daughters who should attain twenty-one or marry in equal shares, and he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the share of any such daughter on trust to invest the same and pay the income to her for life and on her death on certain trusts in favour of her children.

Held: the provision for settlement of the shares of the daughters was not void as against the rule against perpetuities in the case of a daughter living at the death of the testator and would have been valid though other daughters had been born after the death of the testator to whose shares the provision could not legally apply.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of CHITTY, J., holding that a direction by the testator that the plaintiff's share of his residuary estate should be settled upon herself and her children did not infringe the rule against perpetuities, and was consequently not void and that the plaintiffs therefore did not take absolutely. B

By his will, dated Sept. 11, 1877, the testator, George Russell, gave his trustees all his real and the residue of his personal estate upon trust to permit his wife to receive the rents, interests, and annual produce during the term of her natural life, and, after her decease, upon trust to pay the legacies therein mentioned; and he directed his trustees to stand possessed of his real estate and the residue of his personal estate upon trust to allow the same to remain in its then actual state of investment, or to call in and convert the same into money, and to invest the proceeds arising therefrom as therein mentioned, and upon trust to pay the income to his niece Mary Dorrell, the wife of James Dorrell, for her natural life, as therein mentioned; and after her decease to James Dorrell, her husband, for the term of his natural life, and after his decease upon trust to sell and dispose of his real estate, and to dispose of and convert into money his residuary and personal estate, and to stand possessed of the proceeds. C

"In trust for all and every the children or child of the said Mary Dorrell, who being a son or sons shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age, or marry under that age, to be divided between them if more than one in equal shares and proportions, and if there shall be only one such child, in trust for that one and only child." E

Then followed a proviso for the settlement of the share of any daughter of Mary Dorrell in these terms :

"Provided also, and I do hereby expressly declare, that the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will shall stand possessed of the share of any daughter under the provision hereinbefore made upon trust to invest the same as hereinbefore expressed, and to pay the rents, interest, and dividends arising therefrom unto her for the term of her natural life, for her sole and separate use and benefit free from the debts, control, or engagements of any husband with whom she may intermarry, and her receipt alone to be a good discharge for the same and from and after her decease, then upon similar trusts for the benefit of her children as are hereinbefore provided for the children of the said Mary Dorrell." F

By a fourth codicil to his will, dated June 2, 1883, the testator revoked the bequest of any share or interest any son or sons of Mary Dorrell might become entitled to under the trusts of his will arising from the proceeds of sale of his real estate and the conversion of his residuary personal estate after the decease of Mary and James Dorrell, and he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the whole of such proceeds H

"in trust for the daughter or daughters of the said Mary Dorrell as in my said will directed."

The effect of the codicil was to exclude sons of Mary Dorrell, and to make the trustees hold the proceeds of sale and conversion of the real and residuary personal estate subject to the life interests in trust for the daughter or daughters of Mary Dorrell who should attain twenty-one or marry under that age. I

The testator died in October, 1885, leaving him surviving his wife, the first tenant for life, who died in December, 1885; his niece, Mary Dorrell, who died in 1894; and her husband, James Dorrell, who was still living, and was the present and last tenant for life. Mary Dorrell, the niece, had three children, viz., a son; a daughter, who died an infant and unmarried; and the plaintiff, Catherine Mary Dorrell, who

A had attained the age of twenty-one years when the testator died. Under the combined effect of the will and fourth codicil, and subject only to the life interests and the settlement, the plaintiff immediately on the death of the testator became entitled to all the proceeds of the testator's real and residuary personal estate for a vested interest liable only to be partially divested in the event (which never took place) of any sister or sisters living to attain twenty-one or marrying under that age. After the death of her mother and sister this vested interest became absolute, subject only to a life interest in her father and the proviso on which the question in this case turned. The plaintiff took out an originating summons to determine whether she was entitled absolutely, or whether she took a life interest only.

Aug. 9, 1895. RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court, in which, after stating the facts, he said: There can be no question that the plaintiff takes an absolute interest but for the proviso above referred to. It is suggested that the proviso is void for remoteness, inasmuch as there might have been a daughter of Mary Dorrell, born after the testator's death, who would live to take a vested interest, and whose children would not necessarily attain twenty-one within the period allowed by law for the postponement of the vesting of a benefit. No doubt in the case of such a daughter the settlement over directed by the proviso would have been void, but it would be perfectly good as to the interest taken by the plaintiff, who was alive at the testator's death, unless the possible operation of the proviso with reference to the share of a daughter not in existence at the testator's death makes the whole proviso void. Looking at the state of things at his death, it was then clear that the plaintiff must take either the whole or a share, and other daughters of Mary Dorrell might come in and take shares. Assuming them to do so, yet the share of the plaintiff and the share of the other daughters would be perfectly separate and distinct, and completely ascertained and separated within the time allowed by the law. The proviso in no way mixes them up, but operates separately upon each share. The settlement of the plaintiff's share directed by it is perfectly legal, and would have been so even though there were other shares to which the proviso could not legally apply.

If indeed there had been a proviso which could only operate upon all the possible shares if it operated at all, the case would have been different; but the settlement of the plaintiff's share is to take place whether there are other shares or not, and take place from the testator's death in favour of the children of a person then living, and is quite unobjectionable. This is not the case of a gift over which depends upon events so stated as to involve a possibility of its taking place outside the permitted limits, or in favour of persons who might take interests vesting beyond those limits. No splitting of the clause is necessary, since it is so framed as to apply separately to the plaintiff's share. On principle, therefore, the judgment of CHITTY, J., ought to be supported.

The supposed conflict of authority, when the decisions are looked into, is not so great as the plaintiff's counsel attempted to make out. No case binding on the Court of Appeal has been cited which in any way conflicts with the conclusion above arrived at, and indeed there is no case in which after argument as to this point any conflicting decision has been arrived at. On the other side, Griffith v. Pownall (1), Cattling v. Brown (2), Wilson v. Wilson (3), and Knapping v. Tomlinson (4), decided respectively by SHADWELL, V.-C., PAGE WOOD, V.-C., and KINDERSLEY, V.-C., are all authorities in support of the conclusion arrived at, so that the weight of authority is clearly in favour of it.

43 Sol. Jo. 417; 19 Cox, C.C. 317]Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Fortune telling—"Pretending or professing to tell fortunes"—Need to prove intent to deceive—Averment of intent in information—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 4.

By s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824: ". . . every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects . . ." shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond."

In order to justify a conviction of pretending or professing to tell fortunes under s. 4 of the Act, it must be shown that there was an intent to deceive, but it is not necessary to aver an intent to deceive in the information charging the offence. An intent to deceive is implied if the information charging the offence contains the words "pretending or professing."

Notes. The Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, has been partially repealed by the Fraudulent Mediums Act, 1951, s. 2 (30 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 40), but not so as to affect this case.Considered: Davis v. Curry, [1918] 1 K.B. 109; Stonehouse v. Masson, [1921] All E.R. Rep. 534.

Rule Nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into the High Court for the purpose of quashing the same a record of conviction by justices of the city of Manchester, on Jan. 5, 1899, whereby Georgina Jones was convicted that she, on Dec. 22, 1898, at the city of Manchester, unlawfully pretended to tell fortunes contrary to the form of the statute. The rule was obtained by Georgina Jones on the ground that the alleged offence of which she was convicted was not an offence against the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4.

The information laid by a police constable against Georgina Jones stated that

"she on Dec. 22, 1898, at the city of Manchester, did pretend and profess to tell fortunes contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided."

A At the hearing of the charge, one of the witnesses (a woman) said :

B “At 6.45 p.m., on Dec. 22, 1898, I accompanied Mrs. Potts to the shop of the defendant. Shortly after entering we were asked by the defendant: ‘Do you ladies want speaking to?’ We said ‘Yes.’ I then went into another room alone and sat down; the defendant said ‘Which way do you want telling, one shilling, half-a-crown, or five shillings?’ I said ‘One shilling.’ She then took hold of my left hand and looked at it both sides, then told me I had had to work hard, that I had not very many good friends, always more ready to take from me than give. She asked me if I had had an offer of a ring. I said ‘Yes’; she then said, ‘May I ask if you have lost your husband?’ I said ‘He is not dead, but I have not seen him lately.’ She then said I should meet him again next year and that I should be better off and that my marriage had not made a lady of me. She asked me if I was satisfied. I said ‘Yes’ and paid her a shilling.”

C The other witnesses, who had paid the defendant a shilling, gave similar evidence, the defendant saying to each that next year there would be a great change in their fortunes.

In an affidavit made by one of the justices it was stated that the court

D “were satisfied on the evidence given on the hearing of the charge, that Georgina Jones had, on Dec. 22, 1898, unlawfully pretended to tell fortunes, and further that she had so unlawfully pretended to tell fortunes to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty’s subjects.”

W. C. Ryde showed cause.

DARLING, J.—This is an application to bring up, in order to quash, a conviction against Georgina Jones who was charged under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, on an information which charged her that she did unlawfully pretend to tell fortunes. The material words in the section are: [His Lordship read the section, and continued:] The information did not allege anything beyond that Georgina Jones did unlawfully pretend to tell fortunes, and it is said that that information is bad, and that the conviction on it is bad, because the information did not go on to charge that Georgina Jones did pretend to tell fortunes to deceive and impose on some of Her Majesty’s subjects. In other words, what is said is that the averment on the information of doing this in order to deceive is necessary. It is said that you must not read this section in the sense that it is forbidden simply to pretend or profess to tell fortunes, but that you must read it in such a way that those words “to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty’s subjects” are necessary in the sense that they must not be merely found as a fact or as sufficiently imported into the words “pretending or professing,” but that they must be alleged in the information in addition to the words “pretending or professing.”

H Certain cases have been cited to us and among others Smith v. Neilson (1), in the Court of Justiciary in Scotland, which is said to be an authority that those words “to deceive and impose on” are a necessary part of the averment. I am not prepared to say that, if that case does definitely hold that, I do not take the same view, but the judgment of Lord Young differs from the judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk in that Lord Young says :

I “There is the word ‘pretend’ used, but the case for the prosecutor here is that it is not necessary that there should be an intent to deceive and impose upon.”

He goes on to say: “I think that that is extravagant.” I think so too. I do not intend to hold that it is not necessary there should be an intent to deceive and impose on. But here the magistrates have found that

“the said Georgina Jones had on Dec. 22, 1898, unlawfully pretended to tell fortunes, and further that she had so unlawfully pretended to tell fortunes to deceive and impose upon certain of Her Majesty’s subjects.”

In the Court of Justiciary in Scotland, it was contended not only that it was not A necessary to aver on the information that telling fortunes was done with intent to deceive and impose on, but that it was not necessary that any such intent should exist on the part of the fortune-teller.

CLEASBY, B., in Monck v. Hilton (2) makes use of these words (2 Ex.D. at p. 276) :

“The clause includes all persons who pretend to tell fortunes (which imports B that deception is practised by doing so).”

I agree with that. I think that the use in a statute of the words “pretending or professing to tell fortunes,” without going to the part of the statute which contains the words “to deceive and impose on,” does import that deception is practised by doing so. In my opinion, if a person were to say : “I am not a real fortune-teller;
I cannot tell fortunes; what I am about to tell you by means I am about to take C must not deceive in any way, but I will pretend to tell your fortune or I will profess to tell your fortune; I will make use of the ordinary means which people take to do it,” I think no offence would be committed, because in such a case as that it would be sufficient, if that person were indicted for that offence, to prove that there was no intention to deceive at all, but that the whole thing was done in fun and done to D amuse the people at a concert, or in a drawing-room, or simply as an amusement. I think that the words are wide enough to cover a real intent to deceive, and that they do, as CLEASBY, B., says, import that deception is practised, and so, if you prove that deception was practised, or that deception was intended, it is not necessary to aver anything more than what was averred in this case, namely, to pretend to tell fortunes. I come to that conclusion not only because of what CLEASBY, B., says E —and I do not trouble to inquire whether it was obiter dictum or was not—but because, in my opinion, it is perfectly good sense and perfectly good law. I come to this conclusion because I agree with what was said whether it is binding on me or not.

I am further confirmed in this opinion by looking at the words

“or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise to F deceive and impose on any of His Majesty’s subjects.”

I ask myself if it is not necessary to put the words to “deceive and impose on” after “to tell fortunes” because to pretend to tell fortunes imports deceiving and imposing on, why is it necessary to put them after the subsequent words. It seems to me that it was necessary to put them. You could not give any effect to the sub- G sequent words unless they had been put there. Take the case of a person being charged with using some subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise and it is proved that it was not palmistry. In my opinion, the putting of the words “or otherwise to deceive and impose on” is made necessary because the word “otherwise” might include the using of perfectly innocent means or a perfectly innocent device.

Therefore, I think that this information was perfectly good as it stood, and that H it did not need the averment which it is complained is absent, and that the conviction must stand. Further, I think that, if it were necessary to amend we could do so, though I do not think it is necessary to make any amendment.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, in order that there I may be a conviction under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, in respect of fortune-telling, it is necessary that the act should be done in order to deceive. I think that that is so, not because the words “in order to deceive and impose on” apply to the words “pretending or professing to tell fortunes,” but because that meaning is imported and is included in the words “pretending or professing.” I think that pretending or professing bears the meaning of representing, intending that the representation should be believed, and that, if it is not a representation of that character, it is not a pretending and is not a professing within the meaning of the words here used.

A As I said in the course of the argument, I think that persons who are acting do not "pretend." It is a serious offence, I believe, to pretend to be a policeman, but I do not think that, when a man acts the part of a policeman in a pantomime, he pretends to be a policeman. I think that the use of the words "to deceive and impose on" after the words "pretending or professing to tell fortunes" would have been redundant, and, therefore, I think that the offence is sufficiently set out in this

I agree with what my brother has said as to the amendment, and my present opinion is that the conviction might be amended if necessary, but I am not prepared to decide it. There is a little difficulty about amending the description of an offence, but if grammatically the words "to deceive" at the end of the sentence apply to the former part of the sentence, I think that it might be amended, because

C intent to deceive is already contained in the other expression "pretending," and, therefore, the amendment would be a mere matter of form. That is my view of it, but I would prefer to put my decision on the other point.

Injunction—Contract for personal service—Restraint against breach—Agreement by employee to "act exclusively for" employers. Need to prove sufficiently clear and definite negative covenant not to enter employment of others.

G Before an injunction can be granted to enforce a contract of personal service there must be a clear and definite negative covenant, or, if one is implied, it must be so definite that the court can see exactly the limit of the injunction it is to grant. Where, therefore, there is a stipulation in a contract for personal service that a man should "act exclusively for" an employer, that employer has no right to an injunction against the employee to restrain him from entering the employment of another as the terms of the contract are too vague to imply a negative covenant.

Appeal by the plaintiff association from a decision of POLLOCK, B., sitting at chambers, affirming the refusal by a master of an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant Harvey from acting for the defendant company and the defendant company for employing him. A

The plaintiffs were the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, an American association duly established according to American law, the head office being at New York. The plaintiffs had a branch office in Great Britain, situate in the City of London, where they carried on business as an insurance company. The defendant Alfred Robert Harvey was an insurance agent, carrying on business at Liverpool. B

By an agreement in writing, dated June 16, 1894, the defendant Harvey was appointed supervisor of the plaintiff association for the purpose of procuring, effecting, and completing satisfactory applications for membership in the plaintiff association, and for the purpose of collecting the first payment on the application so effected, and also for the purpose of appointing competent and acceptable agents in any unoccupied territory in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, or the Isle of Man. By the agreement the defendant Harvey agreed to "act exclusively for" the plaintiff association, in so far as to tender to them all risks obtained by him or under his control; to thoroughly and efficiently occupy the territory specified in the agreement by the appointment of competent and satisfactory agents, and to faithfully discharge all the duties of his appointment as such supervisor; to devote his time and best energies to the service of the plaintiff association, and efficiently occupy and work the territory assigned to him, otherwise the agreement, so far as it related to future new business, was to be void and of no effect. He also agreed to guard the interests of the plaintiff association, and encourage members in the payment of their premium calls. The contract was to continue in force for the period of five years from the date thereof, upon the condition that the terms and provisions of the agreement were complied with by the defendant Harvey, unless he failed to obtain a volume of business satisfactory to the president or executive committee at the home office of the plaintiff association in New York. C D E

On June 20, 1896, the defendant Harvey entered into an agreement with the defendant company, an American company having a branch office in London, whereby he was appointed agency director of that company for Great Britain and Ireland, for the purpose of canvassing for applications for assurance on the lives of individuals to that company, and of organising agencies for that company in Great Britain and Ireland. The plaintiff association thereupon commenced this action against the defendant Harvey, and the defendant company. They alleged by their statement of claim that subsequent to the date of the agreement, and before the expiration of the period of five years referred to therein, the defendant company well knowing that the defendant Harvey was in the service and employment of the plaintiff association under the agreement, and in order to secure to the defendant company the business connection of the plaintiff association, and in order to damage and injure the plaintiff association in their business, wrongfully enticed and procured the defendant Harvey, unlawfully and without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff association, to depart from the service of the plaintiff association, and to enter the defendant company's service, and to break his aforesaid agreement with the plaintiff association. They alleged that he did this (a) by entering the service and employment of the defendant company before the expiration of the said period of five years; (b) by wholly repudiating the agreement, and refusing to be bound thereby; (c) by neglecting to perform the agreement or any part thereof; (d) by not tendering to the plaintiff association all risks obtained by him or under his control, and by tendering the same to the defendant company; (e) by endeavouring to induce the agents of the plaintiff association to depart from their service, and to enter the employment of the defendant company; and (f) by endeavouring to alienate, and alienating from the plaintiff association, their policy-holders and intending policy-holders. F G H I

The plaintiff association accordingly claimed (i) a declaration that they were exclusively entitled to the services of the defendant Harvey for a period of five years from June 16, 1894, in accordance with the provisions of the agreement; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendant company, until after the expiration of the said period of five years, from retaining the services of, or employing or continuing to employ the defendant Harvey as supervisor or as director of agents, or in any capacity whatsoever not in accordance with the provisions of the agreement; (iii) an injunction to restrain the defendant Harvey, until after the expiration of the said period of five years, from acting, or continuing to act for, or being employed by, the defendant company, or any other person or body corporate, in the capacity of supervisor or director of agents, clerk, agent, servant, or in any capacity whatsoever not in accordance with the provisions of the agreement, and from alienating or seeking to alienate from the plaintiff association their policy-holders or intending policy-holders, and from tendering to any person or persons other than the plaintiff association, any insurance risk or risks obtained by him, his servants or agents, or under his control; and (iv) an inquiry as to what policies had been issued by the defendant company since June 16, 1894, in respect of risks obtained by the defendant Harvey, his servants or agents, or under his control. They also claimed £5,000 damages against each defendant for the wrongful acts complained of.

Subsequently the plaintiff association took out a summons for an interlocutory injunction. The master refused the application, and his refusal was affirmed by POLLOCK, B., sitting at chambers on Aug. 12, 1896. The plaintiff association now appealed.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (with him F. M. Abrahams and Mallinson) for the plaintiff association.

Bigham, Q.C. (with him Muir Mackenzie) for the defendant Harvey.

Robson, Q.C. (with him Bremner) for the defendant company.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is, like many others, rather near the line. It must turn on the true construction of the contract of June 16, 1894, and the true application, when that contract is properly construed, of the principles on which the court is in the habit of acting in such cases as the present.

As regards those principles, I do not think that I need do more than refer to the case which has been cited of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1), because the principles, so far as I am acquainted with them, will be found most fully explained there. I quite agree that, although there may not be a covenant which is absolutely and clearly negative in terms, still, if you can extract from a contract of this kind a negative covenant which is sufficiently clear and definite to enable you—as I used the expression before—to put your finger upon it, and state exactly what a man is not to do, that is as good as a covenant absolutely and clearly negative in terms. The difficulty I have here is in coming to the conclusion that the implied negative covenant is sufficiently definite to warrant the court in granting an injunction as asked. My impression is that it is not. I think that the plaintiffs have taken a much wider view of their rights than the contract justifies.

I say nothing at all about the release of the contract or the cancellation of it, or the substance of it. Let me deal with it on the assumption that it is a subsisting contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant Harvey. One thing the contract does not contemplate—and it is all important—it certainly does not contemplate that Mr. Harvey is to do no business of any kind except performing the duties of his agency for the plaintiffs. He is at liberty to do anything he likes that is consistent with that, and when we come to look at the supposed negative covenant, or the clause that imports a negative covenant, we shall find that it is very carefully and very narrowly restricted.

The plaintiffs are an insurance company—an American company, as I understand, having business in this country—and they appointed Mr. Harvey what they called their supervisor to act in a certain district for the purpose of procuring, effecting, and completing satisfactory applications for membership in that association, and for the purpose of collecting the first payments on the said applications and so on; and also for the purpose of appointing agents in any unoccupied territory. Then we come to a clause, and the only clause which can be said to import a negative covenant. The supervisor, Mr. Harvey, agrees to "act exclusively for" the plaintiffs in so far as to tender to them all risks obtained by him or under his control. Before I comment on that I will go a little further, because the agreement binds Mr. Harvey thoroughly and efficiently to occupy the territory and faithfully to discharge all the duties of his appointment, and to devote his time and best energies to the service of the plaintiffs, and efficiently occupy and work the territory; otherwise the agreement, so far as relates to the future of the new business, shall be void. Then there is a clause—there are other clauses which I do not think it is important to refer to—that, upon condition that the terms and provisions of the agreement are complied with by Mr. Harvey, the contract is to continue in force for five years. Of course, no lawyer could contend that Mr. Harvey was at liberty to break this arrangement, and to take advantage of his own wrong, and to say that there was an end of the contract. That cannot be the meaning of it. But it is very important to observe that the period of five years specified in the agreement is not an absolutely fixed term; it is a term which depends on what the plaintiffs do. Supposing Mr. Harvey does commit a breach, the plaintiffs are at liberty, if they choose, to waive the breach, and to hold him to his five years, or to put an end to the contract, and then there is an end to the five years. The plaintiffs by their statement of claim seem to take the very extraordinary view that they can treat him as having broken the contract, and yet hold him to the five years. But it is manifest that they must either waive the breach, or let the five years go. They must waive their right at all events to take advantage of those breaches.

The whole difficulty arises from the introduction of the word "exclusively" into the clause which I have read, namely, that the supervisor agrees to "act exclusively for" the association in so far as to tender to them all risks obtained by him, or under his control. Bearing in mind that Mr. Harvey is bound to do the best he can under that clause for the plaintiffs, what does it mean? Does it mean that he is to do more than send to the plaintiffs such life assurance risks as he can procure for them? Supposing that a person goes to him and asks him to send on a risk to a totally different company, and Mr. Harvey, acting bona fide, says, "I am the agent for the Mutual Reserve Association, give me a risk for them; make me an offer to insure with them." I should say, on the true construction of this contract, that he is bound to do that. Supposing, however, a person says, "No, I will not have anything to do with that company," there is nothing whatever in the contract, under those circumstances, to prevent Mr. Harvey from sending the risk on to somebody else, for this simple reason that in the case I put the risk would not be risk "obtained by him, or under his control," such as is contemplated by the contract.

The plaintiffs have put a construction on the terms of the contract far wider than they are justified in doing when you come to work the matter out, bearing in mind that you have not got any clear definite negative covenant, nor anything to show what is the exact limitation of the negative covenant. Here the contract appears to me to be of sufficient vagueness to bring this case within the principle of the authority, to which I have already referred, of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1), and not of Lumley v. Wagner (2). As I have pointed out, and I repeat it, I do not think that it is, in accordance with the view taken in this class of case, desirable to extend the principle established thereby. I look upon Lumley v. Wagner (2) and the whole of the cases of that class as rather anomalous. I should be bound by them, and of course follow them, where I have to decide cases of a similar kind. But before an injunction can be granted, in order to enforce a written contract of personal service—because this is a contract of personal service—there must be a clear and definite negative covenant; or, if one is to be implied, which is quite possible, it must be so definite that the court can see exactly the limit of the injunction that it is to grant. I think that this contract is far too hazy, far too indefinite, to do anything of the kind. Therefore it appears to me that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. This is an appeal from my brother POLLOCK, sitting at chambers, he having refused to grant the injunction asked for by the plaintiffs, the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, against the defendant Harvey and the defendant company, the New York Life Insurance Co. I think my brother POLLOCK was quite right in the course he adopted. This is a contract for personal service—there cannot be a doubt about that. It is a contract of June 16, 1894, and it cannot be doubted that there is no negative covenant in terms by the defendant Harvey not to carry on business with any insurance company other than the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. That is clear. But it is said that there is an implied covenant sufficiently definite that he will not do so. I wish to point out that the substance of the plaintiffs' application, and what they really in substance want, and what they take this step for, is to prevent Mr. Harvey from treating with any other company till the five years have run out from the commencement of the agreement on June 16, 1894. That is what they want.

I pass by the suggestion which was made by counsel for the defendant that the contract of June 16, 1894, had lapsed. I do not think that there is much in that, and moreover I doubt very greatly whether it is true. I am not going to decide that point one way or the other; but I am only shortly stating what my opinion is on the affidavits which I have heard read on the one side and the other. I will proceed on the assumption that the contract is a still subsisting contract. First of all, does the contract bind Mr. Harvey not to carry on insurance business with any other company at all? Certainly not. There is no covenant that he shall not do so, and I cannot read into the contract any such implied obligation to be inferred from the contract. But the point taken—and this is only taken under the stress of circumstances—is, that if there be no sufficient definite implied contract that Mr. Harvey should not deal with any other insurance company, still there is an implied contract that he will not deal with them in so far as to tender to them any risks obtained by him or under his control for the plaintiff company. That is the second branch of the argument, but it was not much insisted upon when it was pointed out to the learned counsel that there was no general covenant such as he was trying to assert that there was. I should point out that I am not at all satisfied that the plaintiffs have made out upon the affidavits that Mr. Harvey is going to do anything of this limited character which they assert he is. But if it be so, where do I find any such express negative covenant to bind him not to do what they say he is doing, in what I call the subsidiary case about these risks? I do not see it.

But when I come to authority—though I agree that a case on one contract is not necessarily to apply to another case on another contract—I must say that Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1) is to my mind most uncommonly like this. Without splitting straws, what is the difference between a man undertaking to give his whole time to a person, to his employer, or to one side—and his undertaking that he will act exclusively for him, or that he will not act for anyone else? If you put those phrases before you and ask what is the difference, I should say that there is very little difference between the two; and it would be splitting straws to try and define the difference between them. As I have before observed, the authority has been cited in this court of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1), in which it was held—and I have no doubt rightly held—that where there is a contract for a man to give his whole time to another, there is no negative implied covenant there that he will not act for another. Where a person has contracted to act exclusively for another, how can this court logically say, if Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1), which I apprehend is good law, stands, that there is a negative covenant? I cannot myself bring my mind to a point so fine as that, and I have expressed my opinion on what I think is the true construction of this contract. But I declare that, if I had been sitting at chambers I should have done exactly what apparently POLLOCK, B., did —that is, say that I did not find any negative covenant in this case, or any such implied covenant, not to do that which the defendant is asked to be restrained from doing. This case comes, in my opinion, within Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman (1), which is a binding authority upon us. For these reasons I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed. B

Trade—Goodwill—Sale—Right of vendor to set up competing business—Partnership—Dissolution—Goodwill to belong to one partner—Right of other partner to set up competing business—Right to canvass customers of partnership business. F

When the goodwill of a business is sold the vendor does not, by reason only of that sale and in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, impose upon himself any obligation not to carry on a competing business. But, as the connection formed with customers constitutes the goodwill of a business, a man who has parted with the goodwill must not avail himself of his special knowledge of the old customers to attract them to his competing business. G

PER LORD HERSCHELL: It is the connection with the customers, formed by years of trading, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business. H

PER LORD MACNAGHTEN: What goodwill means must depend on the character and nature of the business to which it is attached. Generally speaking it means much more than what LORD ELDON took it to mean in Crutwell v. Lye (1) (1810), 17 Ves. 335, where he said: "The goodwill which has been the subject of sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place." Often it happens that the goodwill is the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit. It is the whole advantage of the reputation and connection of the firm which may have been built up of years of honest work or gained by lavish expenditure of money. I

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HALSBURY, LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.), [1895] 1 Ch. 462, affirming a decision of STIRLING, J.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Clare for the appellants.
Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and G. Henderson for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 5, 1895. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL. (a)—A very important question, which has given rise to much difference of judicial opinion, presents itself for decision in the present case.

For some years prior to 1876 William Henry Trego, the husband of the appellant Anna Trego, had carried on business as a varnish and japan manufacturer, at Bow and in London, under the name of Tabor, Trego & Co. In that year he took the respondent into partnership, but upon the terms that the goodwill of the business should be and remain the sole property of William Henry Trego. The partnership continued until his death. In February, 1889, a partnership agreement was made between the appellants and the respondent that they should carry on the business under the old style of Tabor, Trego & Co., for a term of seven years. The agreement provided that the goodwill should nevertheless be and remain the sole property of Anna Trego. In December, 1894, the appellants found that the respondent had employed a clerk of the firm, out of office hours, to copy for him the names, addresses, and businesses of all the firm's customers. The respondent admits that his object in having the copy made was to acquire information which would enable him, when the partnership came to an end, to canvass these persons and to endeavour to obtain their custom for himself. The appellants, accordingly, brought this action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the respondent from making copies of or extracts from the partnership books for any purposes other than the business of the partnership. STIRLING, J., in the course of his judgment said :

"It has been admitted in the argument, and for the purposes of it, that the defendant intends, in the event of the partnership coming to an end at the beginning of next year, to use this list for the purpose of soliciting the customers of the present firm. He proposes then to engage in a business of a similar nature to that carried on by the firm, and the question which I have to decide is whether he is entitled to make such use of the list."

It seems clear, therefore, that the point in contest before the learned judge who heard this motion was whether the respondent was entitled to make use of the list of the customers of the firm which he had obtained in order to canvass them when he started business on his own account. I mention this because it may have been open to contention on behalf of the respondent that he was at all events entitled, while he remained a partner, to make copies of the partnership books, and that it was premature to come to the court to restrain the use of these copies even if he were not entitled when he ceased to be a partner to canvass the customers of the firm; but, in view of the fact that the respondent threatened to use the list for the purpose of canvassing the persons named therein, and having regard to the course taken before the learned judge, I think it would have been open to him to grant an injunction, though not in the terms prayed for, if the canvassing of those customers would be a wrongful act on the part of the respondent. STIRLING, J., and the Court of Appeal had, I think, no alternative but to refuse to grant any injunction. They were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal, in Pearson v. Pearson (2), that even though the goodwill belongs to one of the partners, it is lawful for the other, on the termination of the partnership, to canvass the customers of the firm. Consistently with that decision, I think it would have been impossible to hold that the appellants were entitled to an injunction. That case is, however, open to review by your Lordships, and the real question in the present case is whether it was well decided.

The question whether a person who had sold the goodwill of his business was entitled afterwards to canvass the customers of that business came first before the courts for decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3). LORD ROMILLY, M.R., answered in the negative. He was of opinion that the principles of equity must prevail, and that persons are not at liberty to depreciate the thing which they have sold. He considered that the defendant was not entitled personally, or by letter, or by his agent or traveller, to go to anyone who was a customer of the firm, and to solicit him not to continue business with the old firm, but to transfer it to him—that this was not a fair and reasonable thing to do after he had sold the goodwill. He accordingly granted an injunction to restrain the defendant, his partners, servants, or agents, from applying to any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the date of the sale, privately, by letter, personally, or by a traveller, asking such customer to continue to deal with the defendant and not to deal with the plaintiffs.

In Ginesi v. Cooper & Co. (4) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., followed the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) and expressed in very strong terms his concurrence with it. He granted an injunction restraining the defendants, their clerks, servants, agents, workmen, or others, from soliciting or in any way endeavouring to obtain the custom of or orders for goods similar in character to those dealt in by the old firm from such of the customers as were customers of the old firm, or from attempting to take away any portion of the business bought by the plaintiff. This was all the plaintiff in that case asked for, but the learned judge went further, and expressed a strong opinion that a man who sold the goodwill of his business must not only refrain from soliciting the old customers to deal with him, but must not deal with them. It was not, he said, necessary to decide it on that occasion, but he stated it because he thought what the meaning of selling the goodwill of a trade or business is should be thoroughly understood. In Leggott v. Barrett (5), which came before the same learned judge shortly afterwards, he acted upon the same view, and extended the injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the customers of the old firm. From this judgment there was an appeal; but the appellant confined his appeal to that part of the order which restrained him from dealing with the customers of the old firm. He made no objection to the injunction so far as it restrained him from canvassing those customers. The Court of Appeal dissolved that part of the injunction of which the appellant complained. They thought they could not on any just principle prevent the defendant from supplying a man with goods if he applied to him; that there was no implied obligation upon him either legal or moral to shut his door against a customer who came to him of his own free will; that a sale of goodwill did not involve an implied contract not to deal with any customers of the old business, the goodwill of which was sold. The case is chiefly important for present purposes, in so far as it discloses the view taken by the learned judges who on that occasion constituted the Court of Appeal on the point now under consideration.

In Pearson v. Pearson (2), to which I shall have occasion to refer immediately, COTTON, L.J., stated that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was doubted in Leggott v. Barrett (5) by JAMES, L.J., and himself. This is no doubt correct so far as COTTON, L.J., is concerned, but I am unable to find any very clear indication that this was the view of JAMES, L.J. It is quite true that in an early part of his judgment he said (15 Ch.D. at p. 309):

“I do not like going much into the case because what I should say might, perhaps, be considered to mean that the injunction which is submitted to is too wide.”

I But in a latter part of the judgment he says (ibid. at p. 310):

“At first it did appear to me that we might, from the equitable view of the case, say that the defendant should be prevented from dealing with any customer or customers whom he had solicited; but it appeared to me that that was too vague and too wide.”

He pointed out that a man might give the order afterwards without any reference to previous solicitation. Further on, when discussing the effect of the agreement, and showing that there was no implied obligation not to deal with the customer, he says (ibid. at p. 311): "It means that you are not to solicit customers." The impression produced upon my mind by the whole of the judgment is that the learned judge had not arrived at the conclusion that Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was wrong. BRETT, L.J., expressed a decided approval of that decision. He was of opinion that on the sale of a goodwill for a valuable consideration there was an implied contract that the vendor would not solicit former customers who were really the people who formed the goodwill.

The next case in which the matter was brought under consideration of the Court of Appeal was Walker v. Mottram (6). In that case the goodwill of the business carried on by a bankrupt had been sold by his trustees in bankruptcy. It was sought afterwards to restrain the bankrupt from soliciting the customers of that business. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., refused to grant an injunction on the ground that the doctrine laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) did not apply to the case of a bankrupt whose business had been sold by his trustees. This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Of the lords justices who then constituted the court, BAGGALLAY, L.J., expressed a strong doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3). He said that it appeared to him as at present advised that it went far beyond what any of the previous decisions would have sanctioned. LUSH and LINDLEY, L.JJ., the other members of the court, said that the rule laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), had, it was believed, been recognised and acted upon in practice, and whatever else might be said of it the rule was in accordance with the general opinion of what was fair and right, and was easily applied in practice.

In Pearson v. Pearson (2) the question came again before the Court of Appeal. The facts were there less favourable to the plaintiff than in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), and BAGGALLAY and LINDLEY, L.JJ., both considered that, even if Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was rightly decided, the case then before them was not governed by it. BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.JJ., however, distinctly rested their judgments on the ground that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was wrong, and ought to be overruled. LINDLEY, L.J., on the other hand, was of opinion that it was rightly decided. The reason of BAGGALLAY, L.J., for dissenting from Labouchere v. Dawson (3), so far as it is disclosed by the report of his judgment, appears to be that it went beyond a number of decisions of a higher court, and, as he thought, without sufficient reason. Even assuming that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) went beyond previous decisions, this does not seem to me to afford any indication that it was wrong, unless it can be shown that it was in conflict with the principles involved in those earlier decisions. COTTON, L.J., examined the earlier decisions, and arrived at the conclusion that LORD ELDON was against the notion that the vendor of the goodwill of a business was, in the absence of express contract, to be restrained from carrying on a similar business in the way in which he might lawfully carry it on if there had been no sale of the goodwill. The learned lord justice pointed out that LORD ROMILLY, M.R., rested his decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) on the principle that a man could not derogate from his grant. He said (27 Ch.D. at p. 157):

"But it is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business, yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customer from going to the old place. I cannot see where to draw the line. If he may, by his acts, invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so? I think it would be wrong to put such a meaning on 'goodwill' as would give a right to such an injunction as has been granted in the present case."

I propose now to examine the older authorities. I may state at once, however, that I can find nothing in them inconsistent with the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3). It no doubt went beyond them, inasmuch as it dealt with a question not determined by them, but this seems to me to be no demerit, nor to afford any indication that it was wrong. The earliest case which has any bearing upon the point is that of Crutwell v. Lye (1), before LORD ELDON. The business of a bankrupt, who was a carrier between Bristol and London, had been sold by his assignees in bankruptcy. He afterwards commenced carrying on the trade of a carrier between Bristol, Bath, and London, but though the termini were the same the route employed was different. He addressed direct solicitation to the public for the carriage of their goods, stating that he had been reinstated in his business, and there was further, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, so much probability of direct solicitation to the customers of the old concern, in some few instances, that the fact might fairly be assumed. Under these circumstances the purchaser of the bankrupt's business applied for an injunction. The case was therefore the same as Walker v. Mottram (6) where SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., than whom no one has more strongly insisted upon the propriety of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), was of opinion that no injunction should be granted. The bankrupt was no party to the contract of sale; there could, therefore, be no implied contract on his part to be derived from it.

It is most material also to observe what was the question relating to the nature of the injunction then claimed. It was whether the bankrupt was to be restrained from carrying on the trade which he was pursuing of carrying goods between Bristol, Bath, and London. The Lord Chancellor held that he could not be so restrained, and I think it must now be taken as settled that the sale of the goodwill of a business, even when the vendor himself is a party to the contract, does not impose upon him any obligation to refrain from carrying on a trade of the same nature as before. But LORD ELDON certainly did not decide that such a vendor was entitled to solicit the customers of the old firm. He was not asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant from so doing. It was sufficient for the decision of that case that, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, there was no principle arising out of the provisions of the bankruptcy law upon which the court could hold that the bankrupt ought not to engage in the same trade and by the same road as before, though I think that, so far, the opinion of the Lord Chancellor would have been the same if the sale of the business had been effected by the bankrupt himself, and not by his assignees. The importance of the case consists in the definition which LORD ELDON gave of the goodwill there sold. He said (17 Ves. at pp. 346, 347):

"The goodwill which has been the subject of the sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Fraud would form a different consideration, but if that effect was prevented by no other means than those which belong to the fair course of improving a trade in which it was lawful to engage I should, by interposing, carry the effect of my injunction to a much greater length than any decision has authorised or imagination suggested."

These observations were much relied on by CORROX, L.J., in Pearson v. Pearson (2). If the language of LORD ELDON is to be taken as a definition of goodwill of general application, I think it is far too narrow, and I am not satisfied that it was intended by LORD ELDON as an exhaustive definition. In Churton v. Douglas (7), WOOD, V.-C., said (John. at p. 188):

"'Goodwill', I apprehend, must mean every advantage, every positive advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner not carrying on the business himself, that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business."

The learned Vice-Chancellor pointed out in this connection that it would be absurd to say that when a large wholesale business is conducted, the public are mindful whether it is carried on in Fleet Street or in the Strand. The question, what is meant by "goodwill," is, no doubt, a critical one. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., discussing in Ginesi v. Cooper & Co. (4), the language of WOOD, V.-C., which I have just quoted, said (14 Ch.D. at p. 600) :

"Attracting customers to the business is a matter connected with the carrying on of it. It is the formation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold, and they really had nothing else to sell in the shape of goodwill."

He pointed out that, in the case before him, the connection had been formed by years of work. The members of the firm knew where to sell the stone, and he asks :

"Is it to be supposed that they did not sell that personal connection when they sold the trade or business and the goodwill thereof?"

The present Master of the Rolls [LORD ESHER] took much the same view as to what constitutes the goodwill of a business.

I cannot myself doubt that they were right. It is the connection thus formed, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business. It is this which constitutes the difference between a business just started, which has no goodwill attached to it, and one which has acquired a goodwill. The former trader has to seek out his customers from among the community as best he can. The latter has a custom ready made. He knows what members of the community are purchasers of the articles in which he deals, and are not attached by custom to any other establishment.

What obligations, then, does the sale of the goodwill of a business impose upon the vendor? I do not think that they would necessarily be the same under all circumstances. In Cook v. Collingridge (8), LORD ELDON, L.C., had to determine what orders were to be given where a partnership had expired by effluxion of time, and where the goodwill had to be valued. He declared that there existed no obligation upon the partners to restrain them from carrying on the same trade, or any of them wanting to do so; that a claim to have an estimated value put upon any subject that could be considered as described by the term "goodwill" could not be supported upon the same grounds or principles as those on which a value was received from a partner buying the share of the partner going out of the business and retiring from the trade altogether. He thought that all that could be valued was the chance of the customers adhering to the old establishment notwithstanding that the previous partners or any of them carried on a similar business elsewhere.

In Johnson v. Hellely (9) a bill was filed by the surviving partner to wind-up the business of the partnership. The usual decree was made. The chief clerk certified that it was most beneficial that the business should be sold as a going concern. The Master of the Rolls ordered it to be stated in the advertisement and particulars that the surviving partner would be at liberty to continue carrying on the business of a wine merchant in the same town and place. This judgment was affirmed by the lords justices.

In Hall v. Barrows (10), LORD WESTBURY, L.C., said (4 De G.J. & Sm., at p. 159) :

"I think the direction to value the goodwill should be accompanied by a declaration defining what is meant by it, at least negatively—that is to say, that a declaration that the goodwill is not to be valued upon the principle that the surviving partner, if he were not the purchaser, will be restrained from setting up the same description of business."

In cases of this description, where a partnership has been dissolved by effluxion of time or death, the goodwill is regarded as a part of the assets, and subject, therefore, to realisation on winding-up the partnership; but it would obviously be absurd that, because a partnership becomes thus dissolved, those who formerly constituted the firm, or the survivors thereof where the dissolution has been due to death, should

A thereafter be restrained from carrying on what trade they pleased. Whatever restriction the sale of the goodwill may impose, it is clear that in this class of cases it could not extend to prevent the former partners carrying on a similar trade to that in which they were previously engaged. It is noteworthy that in Johnson v. Hellely (9) it was thought necessary to warn intending purchasers that, though the goodwill was being sold, one of the persons who had previously carried on the business might continue to trade in the same town, and LORD WESTBURY thought it necessary to give the same warning to the person who was to value the goodwill in Hall v. Barrow (10).

C These circumstances appear to me to afford an indication that the courts recognised that their view of what was meant by "goodwill" and the effect of a sale of it differed from the popular conception. Where the goodwill of a business is not sold under circumstances such as I have been discussing, but the sale is the voluntary act of the vendors, I am by no means satisfied that a different effect might not have been given to the sale and the obligations which it imposed. It might have been held that the vendor was not entitled to derogate from his grant by seeking in any manner to withdraw from the purchaser the customers of the old business, as he would do by setting up a business in such a place or under such circumstances that D it would immediately compete for the old customers. It is now, however, too late to make any such distinction. I think it must be treated as settled that whenever the goodwill of a business is sold the vender does not, by reason only of that sale, come under a restriction not to carry on a competing business.

E This is really the strong point in the position of those who maintain that Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was wrongly decided. COTTON, L.J., says (27 Ch.D. at p. 157):

F "It is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business. Yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customers from going to the old place. I cannot see where to draw the line; if he may, by his acts, invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so."

I quite feel the force of this argument, but it does not strike me as conclusive. It is often impossible to draw the line and yet possible to be perfectly certain that particular acts are on one side of it or the other. It does not seem to me to follow G that because a man may, by his acts, invite all men to deal with him, and so, among the rest of mankind, invite the former customers of the firm, he may use the knowledge which he has acquired of what persons were customers of the old firm in order, by an appeal to them, to seek to weaken their habit of dealing where they have dealt before, or whatever else binds them to the old business, and so to secure their custom for himself. This seems to me to be a direct and intentional dealing with H the goodwill, and an endeavour to destroy it. If a person who has previously been partner in a firm sets up in business on his own account and appeals generally for custom, he only does that which any member of the public may do, and that which those carrying on the same trade are already doing. It is true that those who were former customers of the firm to which he belonged may, of their own accord, transfer their custom to him; but this incidental advantage is unavoidable, and does I not result from any act of his. He only conducts his business in precisely the same way as he would if he had never been a member of the firm to which he previously belonged. But when he specifically and directly appeals to those who were customers of the previous firm he seeks to take advantage of the connection previously formed by his old firm, and of the knowledge of that connection which he has previously acquired, to take that which constitutes the goodwill away from the persons to whom it has been sold, and to restore it to himself.

It is said, indeed, that he may not represent himself as a successor of the old firm, or as carrying on a continuation of their business; but this, in many cases, appears to me of little importance, and of small practical advantage if canvassing the customers of the old firm were allowed without restraint. I do not think that in cases where an injunction was granted in terms employed in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) there would be any real difficulty in drawing the line and determining whether there had been a breach of it or not. In several cases such injunctions were granted, and there is nothing to show that any practical difficulty arose in enforcing them. It is not material to consider whether, on the sale of a goodwill, the obligation on the part of the vendor to refrain from canvassing the customers is to be regarded as based on the principle that he is not entitled to depreciate that which he has sold, or as arising from an implied contract to abstain from any act intended to deprive the purchaser of that which has been sold to him and to restore it to the vendor. I am satisfied that the obligation exists, and ought to be enforced by a court of equity.

I have dealt with the case as if the goodwill had been sold, but I think that the rights and obligations must be precisely the same, for present purposes, when, on the creation of a partnership, it has been agreed that the goodwill shall belong exclusively to one of the partners. For these reasons I think the judgment must be reversed, and that an injunction should be granted in the form adopted in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), with the modification rendered necessary by the circumstances that here the partnership has not yet expired. The respondent must repay to the appellants the costs which the Court of Appeal ordered them to pay to him. LORD ASHBOURNE, who is unable to be present today, concurs in the opinion which I propose to your Lordships.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.— The question for the House to determine is this. Is a person who has sold the goodwill of his business, or one in the position of the respondent, who has been taken into partnership upon the terms that, on the expiration of the partnership, the goodwill shall belong solely to his partner, at liberty to solicit the old customers of the business to give their custom in preference to him? In 1872 LORD ROMILLY, M.R., decided the question in the negative in Labouchere v. Dawson (3). In 1884 the question was determined the other way by the Court of Appeal in Pearson v. Pearson (2); and Labouchere v. Dawson (3) was overruled by BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.JJ., differing from LINDLEY, L.J., who thought LORD ROMILLY's decision right.

In Labouchere v. Dawson (3) the question arose out of a sale of goodwill. In the present case there is a subsisting partnership between the appellants and the respondents in the business of varnish manufacturers. One of the terms of the partnership is that the goodwill "shall be and remain the sole property" of the appellant Anna Trego. The partnership will expire on Jan. 1, 1896. The business is extremely lucrative, the connection very large. The respondent is, or was when this action was commenced, employing one of the clerks in copying out the names and addresses of the customers of the firm, with the avowed intention of soliciting their custom as soon as the partnership expires. The object of the action was to obtain an injunction to restrain this proceeding on the part of the respondent. It is not necessary to consider whether the action at the outset was or was not open to objection on technical or other grounds. For this much, at least, is to be said in favour of the respondent—that he met the case fairly and frankly from the very first, without any attempt to embarrass the plaintiff or to conceal his own object. His case was: "The law allows it." There was, indeed, or there seemed to be at the last moment, if I am not doing an injustice to the respondent, an attempt on his part to recede from the position which up to that time he had maintained, and to suggest difficulties in the way of any judgment in favour of the appellants. But I am quite sure that your Lordships will not for a moment listen to such a suggestion after the case has been fought out in all the courts on the real issue between the parties.

After the observations of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack I do not

A think it necessary to deal with the question at any length. The arguments on the one side and on the other are summed-up in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) and Pearson v. Pearson (2), and little remains but to choose between the conflicting views of very eminent lawyers. Nor do I think it necessary to do more than allude to the case in which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., held that a person who had sold the goodwill of his business could not even deal with his former customers: Leggott v. Barrett (5).

B There I think the Master of the Rolls went too far. The decision trenched on the rights of the public. On the other hand, the Master of the Rolls was, I think, clearly right in refusing to extend the principle of Labouchere v. Dawson (3) to a sale in bankruptcy: Walker v. Mottram (6). There is, I think, all the difference in the world between the case of a man who sells what belongs to himself and receives the consideration and a man whose property is sold without his consent by his trustee in

C bankruptcy, and who comes under no obligation, express or implied, to the purchaser from the trustee.

PLUMER, V.-C., in Harrison v. Gardner (11), in 1817, said (2 Madd. at p. 219):

D "A person not a lawyer could not imagine that when the goodwill and trade of a retail shop were sold the vendor might the next day set up a shop within a few doors and draw off all the customers. The goodwill of such a shop in good faith and honest understanding must mean all the benefit of the trade, and not merely a benefit of which the vendor might the next day deprive the vendee. The authorities, however, are strong to show that the sale of a goodwill does not import restraint, and that a person selling the goodwill of a business for however large a consideration is not prevented setting up the trade."

E I agree, in substance, with the Vice-Chancellor's observations.

What "goodwill" means must depend on the character and nature of the business to which it is attached. Generally speaking it means much more than what LORD ELDON took it to mean in the particular case before him, in Crutwell v. Lye (1), where he says (17 Ves. at p. 346):

F "The goodwill, which has been the subject of sale, is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place."

Often it happens that the goodwill is the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit. It is the whole advantage, whatever it may be, of the reputation and connection of the firm, which may have been

G built up by years of honest work, or gained by lavish expenditure of money. I do not think that "a person not a lawyer," to use the Vice-Chancellor's phrase, would suppose that a man might sell the goodwill of his business and then set to work to withdraw from the purchaser the benefit of his purchase. However, authorities, which it is now too late to question, do undoubtedly show that a man who has sold the goodwill of his business may do much to regain his former position, and yet

H keep on the windy side of the law. The common law has always been jealous of any interference with trade. It was a lighter matter to interfere with freedom of contract and avoid covenants under seal. And so, the common law being the final arbiter on these questions, too little attention perhaps was paid to what was fair and just between man and man. A person who has sold the goodwill of his business is under no obligation to retire altogether from the field. Trade he undoubtedly may, and

I in the very same line of business. If he has not bound himself by special stipulation, and if there is no evidence of the understanding of the parties beyond that which is common to all cases, he is free to set up in business wherever he chooses.

But, then, how far may he go? He may do everything that a stranger to the business, in ordinary course, would be in a position to do. He may set up where he will. He may push his wares as much as he pleases. He may thus interfere with the custom of his neighbour as a stranger and an outsider might do; but he must not, I think, avail himself of his special knowledge of the old customers to regain, without consideration, that which he has parted with for value. He must not make his approaches from the vantage ground of his former position. He may not sell the custom and steal away the customers. That, at all events, is opposed to the common understanding of mankind and the rudiments of commercial morality. Is it conceivable that the respondent would ever have been taken into partnership if he had hinted at such a manœuvre while negotiations for a partnership were pending? It was said that you cannot draw the line; but I think the line may be drawn at this point. It is quite true that you cannot protect the purchaser completely. With LINDLEY, L.J., I regret it. It is quite true that it would be better that he should protect himself by taking apt covenants from the person with whom he is dealing. But this, I think, is rather a counsel of perfection than a reason for leaving the purchaser entirely at the mercy of the vendor.

The principle on which Labouchere v. Dawson (3) rests has been presented in various ways. A man may not derogate from his own grant; the vendor is not at liberty to destroy or depreciate the thing which he has sold; there is an implied covenant on the sale of goodwill that the vendor does not solicit the custom which he has parted with; it would be a fraud on the contract to do so. These, as it seems to me, are only different turns and glimpses of a proposition which I take to be elementary. It is not right to profess and to purport to sell that which you do not mean the purchaser to have; it is not an honest thing to pocket the price, and then to recapture the subject of sale, to decoy it away or call it back before the purchaser has had time to attach it to himself and make it his very own. I am of opinion that the appellants are entitled to judgment.

LORD DAVEY.—This appeal comes before your Lordships in a somewhat unsatisfactory form. The plaintiffs and the defendant are partners together for a term which will expire on Jan. 1, 1896. On the expiration of the partnership the goodwill of the trade or business will be the sole property of the plaintiff, Anna Trego. The notice of motion asked that the defendant might be restrained from making any copy or extract from the books of the partnership for any purpose other than the business of the partnership. In my opinion, the relief asked was misconceived. As well under the general law as under the express provision of the articles of partnership the defendant was entitled during the partnership to have access to the books and to make copies thereof or extracts therefrom. It is conceivable that, if the defendant proposed to use such extracts for purposes injurious or hostile to the interests of his firm, he might be restrained from so doing. But in such case it would not be the obtaining of the information, but the use the partner proposed to make of it when obtained, which would be restrained. In my opinion, the plaintiffs have no right to prevent the defendant from making any extracts from the books he thinks fit. Indeed, in the present case, as was observed at the Bar, the list of the creditors of the firm would be of service to the defendant if the law as laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) be maintained, in order to enable him to know whom he may not solicit, and to keep himself within the law. It was, however, admitted that the defendant intends after the expiration of the partnership to set up a business on his own account similar to that carried on by his firm, and he claims the right, if he thinks fit to do so, to solicit custom for his own business from the customers of his present firm. The question which has been argued before your Lordships is whether he has any such right.

Upon this question there has been a remarkable difference of judicial opinion. The defendant has contracted for valuable consideration that, at the expiration of the partnership, the goodwill shall belong to the plaintiff, Anna Trego. To the lay mind it would undoubtedly seem a remarkable state of the law that a person who has entered into such a contract should be at liberty to go to the customers of the old firm and solicit them not to deal with the plaintiff, but to deal with him, and thus endeavour to secure for himself the business connection which he has contracted shall belong to the plaintiff. But it would probably seem to the lay mind equally remarkable that a man who has sold a business and goodwill to another should be at liberty to set up a similar business on his own account in the same street next door, or opposite to the premises on which the business he has sold was and is carried on—nay, more, that he may advertise himself as having been a partner in or the founder or the manager of the business which he has sold, provided that he does not represent that the business which he is carrying on is the same identical business with that which he has sold. Yet it is well settled that he may do all this.

It has been established by a series of cases that in the sale of a goodwill or business no covenant is implied that the vendor will not start a new business in opposition to the purchaser of the old business. It is enough to refer to Crutwell v. Lye (1), Churton v. Douglas (7), Johnson v. Hellely (9), and the dicta in Hookham v. Pottage (12). An express covenant not to carry on business would be incapable of being enforced as a restraint of trade if it was larger than the necessity of the case, having regard to the particular character of the business, demanded, or perhaps unless it was restricted in some way either in time or space. It seems to follow that a general covenant not to carry on business in competition with the purchaser, which would be invalid if expressed, cannot be implied. I think it is to be gathered from dicta and expressions used by learned judges in the Court of Chancery that the idea of goodwill and of what is comprised in the sale of a business has silently been developed and grown since the days of LORD ELDON, who, in one passage of his judgment in Crutwell v. Lye (1), seemed to regard goodwill as only the habit of customers to resort to the old premises. In Labouchere v. Dawson (3), LORD ROMILLY, M.R., granted an injunction against the vendor of the goodwill of a brewery from applying to any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the date of the sale

“privately by letter, personally, or by a traveller, asking such customer to continue to deal with the vendor, or not to deal with the purchasers.”

The judgment was based on the principle that a man cannot derogate from his own grant; that he cannot sell a thing and destroy the value of it. It was admitted in the judgment that a man may solicit customers in any public manner he pleased.

It is agreed on all hands that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) went considerably beyond the cases relating to goodwill decided before that time. In Ginesi v. Cooper & Co. (4), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., expressed himself as prepared to extend the injunction so as to prohibit the vendor from dealing with the customers; and in Leggott v. Barrett (5) he granted an injunction to that effect, but that part of the order was reversed in the Court of Appeal, and I understand that no such order is now asked for at the Bar. I may remark, in passing, that the injunction in Ginesi v. Cooper (4) went far beyond the order in Labouchere v. Dawson (3) and to an extent which, in my opinion, cannot in any event be supported. It restrained the defendant

“from in any way endeavouring to obtain the custom of such of the customers of the petitioner as were customers of the old firm, or from attempting to take away any portion of the business bought by the petitioner.”

This form of order would prevent the defendant from issuing public advertisements or carrying on business in competition with the petitioner, as it is admitted he may do.

In Leggott v. Barrett (5) there was no appeal against that part of the order, which simply followed Labouchere v. Dawson (3). It was, therefore, unnecessary for the court to express any opinion upon it. The present Master of the Rolls [LORD ESHER], however, expressed his approval of the doctrine. JAMES and COTTON, L.JJ., did not express any approval of it, and I think it may be inferred from the judgments that COTTON, L.J., certainly, and JAMES, L.J., possibly, were not prepared to do so. In Pearson v. Pearson (2) BAGGALLAY and COTTON, L.JJ., expressed their dissent from Labouchere v. Dawson (3), and overruled it, while LINDLEY, L.J., expressed his approval of it. A

The present case is in substance an appeal from Pearson v. Pearson (2). On the argument of this case at your Lordships' Bar it certainly appeared to me that the logical result of the principle upon which I understand Labouchere v. Dawson (3) to be founded would be to restrain the vendor of the goodwill of a business from carrying on business in competition with the purchaser at all. Your Lordships were not asked to take that course. And, having regard to the well-established doctrine against restraint of trade, it would be impossible, as I have already said, to imply such a general covenant. I doubted whether it was right, if you allowed the vendor to trade in competition, to impose fetters upon him which might prevent his doing so effectually or successfully. I was also struck with the vagueness and difficulty of applying the injunction as granted in Labouchere v. Dawson (3). Questions may arise as to the persons to be comprised under the designation of customers. The injunction also may operate most unequally. In a business of a special character it might practically prevent the defendant from carrying on business at all, whereas, in a business of a different character, it might have very little effect. B C

Further consideration, however, has satisfied me that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), although it does not go so far as I think would be abstractedly just, is founded on a right principle, and the difficulty of doing complete justice should not prevent us from meting out such scanty measure of protection to the purchaser of a goodwill as the circumstances permit of, and although the difficulties I have pointed out exist they are not insuperable or (probably) formidable in practice. The question whether any person is a customer within the meaning of the injunction is one of fact to be ascertained when it arises. I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which has been delivered by LORD HERSCHELL, and I desire to express my concurrence in the reasoning upon which it is founded. In particular, I think that the principle on which the injunction asked for may be supported is that the defendant is availing himself of the knowledge of the connection formed by his old firm to take away or to depreciate the value of the goodwill and connection which he has contracted shall belong to the plaintiff. I agree as to the form of the injunction, and also as to the costs. D E F

Re DAVID AND MATTHEWS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), December 15, 1898, January 24, 1899]

Partnership articles provided, in effect, that on the death of one or two partners all the assets should be valued and purchased by the surviving partner.

Held: the goodwill formed part of the partnership assets and ought to be valued on the footing that, if the business were sold, the surviving partner would be at liberty to carry on a rival business, but could not use the name of the partnership firm nor solicit the customers of the old firm.

Case Stated pursuant to s. 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [see now s. 21 of the Arbitration Act, 1950].

M. Letricheux and Edmond David carried on business in Swansea as coal merchants, coal brokers, and commission agents, under the style or firm of "Letricheux and David" up to the death of M. Letricheux, on Dec. 25, 1876. After M. Letricheux's death Edmond David and Richard John Matthews entered into partnership under articles of partnership dated Mar. 23, 1877, which provided that the style of the firm should be "Letricheux and David", and further provided:

"8. In case of the death of one of the partners a general account of the position shall be made, including all effects and securities of whatsoever nature that they possess, and the value of such effects and securities be estimated as at the date of such decease. Two appraisers shall be appointed to fix the value of the effects and securities, one by the surviving partner, the other by the lawful heirs of the deceased; and if these two do not agree, they must appoint a third person whose decision shall be final. 9. The portion decided upon as belonging to the heirs of the deceased partner cannot be withdrawn from the business before three years from the date of the said decease, but during this time the heirs shall have a right to half of the share of the profits which would have belonged to the deceased partner."

In addition to the business formerly carried on by the original firm of Letricheux and David, Edmond David and R. J. Matthews engaged in the business of ship managers and ship brokers. The partnership between Edmond David and R. J. Matthews continued until the death of Edmond David intestate on Mar. 11, 1896. After his death it was agreed between Louise David, his administratrix, and R. J. Matthews that, in lieu of having two appraisers as provided by art. 8 of the articles of partnership, one person should act as sole appraiser and arbitrator, and they appointed R. G. Cawker to make a general account of the position of the partnership business at the date of the death of Edmond David.

It was contended before the arbitrator by Louise David that the business had a goodwill, and that in estimating the value of the effects and securities belonging to the partnership he ought to set a value on such goodwill; and it was contended by R. J. Matthews that there was not any goodwill attached to the business, and that, even if there was any such goodwill, it was not a subject which ought to be valued by the arbitrator. The following questions were submitted for the opinion of the court: (i) Whether under art. 8 of the articles of partnership the arbitrator ought to consider the question of goodwill, and set a value upon the goodwill (if any) which he might consider to have been attached to the business at the death of Edmond David; (ii) whether or not, in considering the question of goodwill, the arbitrator should appraise the value (if any) on the footing that if it were sold, R. J. Matthews would be at liberty to carry on a rival business, but without any right to solicit any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the death of Edmond David to continue to deal with R. G. Matthews or not to deal with the purchaser, and whether or not he should appraise such value (if any) on the footing that, if it were sold, R. J. Matthews would not be entitled to carry on business under the name of Letricheux and David, or on what other footing he should appraise such value, if any.

ROMER, J.— With regard to the first question submitted for my opinion, I do not think there is any real difficulty. Articles 8 and 9 of the partnership agreement constituted in substance a contract for sale of the partnership assets to the surviving partner. This being so, then on principle and on the authorities cited I am of opinion that, as the goodwill formed part of the effects of the partnership at the death of Edmond David, it ought to be valued. The authorities were so fully cited and discussed in the recent case of Jennings v. Jennings (1), before STIRLING, J., that I need not again review them; and, indeed, I do not suppose that the surviving partner in the case before me would admit that the share or interest of the deceased partner in the goodwill had not passed to him, bearing in mind what the effect of such an admission might be. I ought perhaps to add, with reference to an argument addressed to me based on the special provisions of art. 9 of the partnership agreement, that I cannot gather from that article that the share of profits payable to the representatives of the deceased partner was given in lieu of payment of that partner's share of goodwill. The more natural inference is that the share of profits was given in lieu of interest on the deceased partner's portion allowed to remain in the business.

A With regard to the second question, I feel more difficulty. I think that the goodwill ought to be valued on the footing of the consideration of what its value would have been to the partnership if there had been no contract between the partners that the surviving partner should purchase the share of the deceased partner in the partnership effects and securities, and therefore, on the footing that if it were sold the surviving partner would be at liberty to carry on a rival business, B but also, I think, on the footing that he could not use the name of the partnership firm of Letricheux and David, and would not have the right to solicit the old customers of the firm.

C I will take the case of a partnership of the ordinary kind determined by the death of one partner, and will consider what the rights of the deceased partner would be. The goodwill of the business would be an asset, and might well be the most valuable asset, of the partnership. The executors would, therefore, in the absence of special provision in the partnership contract, be entitled to require that the goodwill should be sold, together with the other assets, for the purposes of division between the executors and the surviving partner, and, if the surviving partner refused to carry out this implied contract, then the executors could, by an action in the Chancery D Division obtain an order for the sale of the goodwill under the direction of the court. This is now well settled, though at one time it was considered and had been decided (see Hammond v. Douglas (2)) that the goodwill survived for the benefit of the living partner. And in the meantime, pending the sale, I think the surviving partner would not be allowed to appropriate to himself the goodwill which belonged to the partnership: see Turner v. Major (3). In that case, which E was one of dissolution by agreement between living partners, there was a special agreement that the goodwill should be sold. But I can see no difference in principle, so far as concerns the point I am now dealing with, between a special contract that the goodwill should be sold and the contract implied by the court in ordinary cases of partnership; see also Taylor v. Neate (4). In Lewis v. Langdon (5) (7 Sim. at p. 425) there are some observations of SHADWELL, V.-C., which would F seem to imply that he regarded a surviving partner as being under no obligation to the legal personal representatives of a deceased partner to preserve the goodwill, but those observations must, I think, be regarded as based on the above-mentioned case of Hammond v. Douglas (2), which at that time was probably regarded as representing the law on the subject of goodwill.

G If, then, it is not permissible for a surviving partner to appropriate to himself the goodwill of the partnership business, it follows that he ought not to do—and in case of necessity would be restrained by the court pending a sale of the goodwill for the benefit of the partnership from doing any act in excess of his rights which, if not stopped, would enable him to obtain the goodwill or any part of it. For example, though a surviving partner is within his rights in carrying on a similar or rival business, he could in my opinion be restrained from carrying on that rival H business in the name of the partnership firm so as to lead to the belief that he was carrying on the partnership business, or so as otherwise to appropriate to himself the goodwill of that business. In saying this, I am not considering special cases of difficulty which might arise if the name of the surviving partner was exactly the same as that of the partnership firm, and he was doing nothing else which might injure the goodwill beyond carrying on a similar business in his own I name, but am only dealing with ordinary cases. In those cases which at first sight might appear to conflict with the view I have expressed, it will be found on examination that, so far as not overruled, they do not really conflict.

I need not again refer to the cases of Hammond v. Douglas (2) and Lewis v. Langdon (5), or refer in detail to cases or observations in cases—as in Robertson v. Quiddington (6) (28 Beav. at p. 536)—based on the erroneous supposition that Hammond v. Douglas (2) was a binding authority. As to Webster v. Webster (7), that was not a case where the executors of the deceased partner were seeking to protect the goodwill, but was an application by them to restrain the surviving partner from using the name of the firm, based merely on the ground (obviously untenable) that thereby the estate of the deceased partner might be made liable. With regard to Banks v. Gibson (8), it was a case, according to the view of the judge who decided it, where co-partners had agreed on dissolution to divide the assets, including the goodwill, so as to allow either partner to use the name of the partnership firm. A

I know of no other case bearing on the point which calls for special comment. It is true I cannot find any case directly establishing the right of the executors of a deceased partner, in order to protect the goodwill, to an injunction to restrain the surviving partner from carrying on business in the name of the partnership firm. But that is not extraordinary when it is considered that up to comparatively recent times it was considered that the right to the goodwill belonged to the surviving partner, and that it is only recently that the importance of goodwill and the necessity of preventing its improper appropriation has been fully recognised, and I may refer, as illustrating this, to the very recent important decision of the House of Lords in Trego v. Hunt (9). And, bearing in mind that in ordinary cases of dissolution of partnership by death of one partner there is implied a right to have the goodwill sold, which would have to be carried out by an assignment of the goodwill to the purchaser, it is pertinent to refer to what JAMES, L.J., said in Levy v. Walker (10) (10 Ch.D. at p. 448), that without any doubt on his part the assignment of the goodwill of a business conveyed the right to use the name of the business sold, and the exclusive right to use the name as between vendor and purchaser. B
I
It further appears to me to follow that, in considering the value of the goodwill, it should be appraised on the footing that the surviving partner would not be at liberty to solicit customers of the old firm, for, if the goodwill had been sold in the ordinary way on the death and had been assured to the purchaser, it is clear since Trego v. Hunt (9) that the surviving partner, who would have been one of the vendors, could not injure the goodwill sold by soliciting the customers of the old firm. And see Jennings v. Jennings (1), and, while referring to that case, I desire to add a few observations on the point mentioned by STIRLING, J. ([1898] 1 Ch. at pp. 389, 390), and which occasioned him some doubt. In cases of sale of a business by the court for the purpose of winding-up a partnership it has been the practice to provide by the particulars of sale that the sale would not prevent other persons previously interested in the business, or their representatives, from carrying on a like business. But that provision is inserted whether the dissolution of partnership occurs by death of a partner or in the lifetime of all the partners; and the reason of its insertion is to prevent a purchaser being misled into supposing that he is buying, or that the vendors are going to sell to him, anything beyond what would be implied by the law by an assignment of the goodwill of the business: see the observations of TURNER, L.J., and KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., in Johnson v. Helleley (11) (2 De G.J. & S. at pp. 448, 449). The provision is not intended to give any right to the partners or their representatives to appropriate to themselves the benefit of the goodwill which has to be sold. It merely points out, so as to prevent any mistake or misunderstanding, that the sale of the goodwill of a business does not in itself prevent vendors from carrying on a like business, but the provision does not provide, and is not intended to provide, that the like business may be carried on by the vendors in a manner incompatible with their position as vendors. For example, in case of a sale on dissolution between two living partners whose names differ from the name under which the partnership business had been carried on, the provision in question would not entitle any partner to carry on a like business in the partnership name, so as to lead to the belief that his business was the same as or a continuation of the partnership business. And in the same way, in my opinion, the provision would not entitle one of the partner vendors to injure the goodwill sold by soliciting the customers of the partnership firm.

With regard to Pearson v. Pearson (12), also referred to by STIRLING, J., in Jennings v. Jennings (1), if the whole of the agreement in question in that action

A be looked at, and the circumstances under which it was entered into be considered. I think it is clear that the parties must have intended that the defendant should be authorised to carry on business in the same way as any stranger might do, and certainly that was the view which was taken by the Court of Appeal, and upon which its decision was based.

B Before parting with the case which I have now to decide, it appears to me that there is another and a shorter way of dealing with it which leads to the same conclusions as those above pointed out. By the partnership agreement, Mr. David and Mr. Matthews contracted that the partnership assets, which would include the goodwill, should on the death of one be sold to the survivor. For the purpose of valuing the goodwill, no difference can properly be drawn between a contract to sell to one of the partners and a contract to sell to a stranger. If the partners had contracted that on the death of one the goodwill should be sold to a stranger, the stranger buying and taking an assignment of the goodwill would have been entitled to prevent the survivor of the partners from carrying on a like business in the name of the firm "Letricheux and David," and from soliciting the customers of the firm.

HELBY v. MATTHEWS AND OTHERS

G [HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), April 30, May 30, 1895]

Hire-Purchase—Nature of transaction—Contract to hire with option to buy—Not contract of sale and purchase—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict., c. 45), s. 9.

H By an agreement made between the appellant, therein called the "owner," and B., therein called the "hirer," the hirer agreed to pay a monthly rent or "hire instalment" to the owner in respect of the hire of a piano on the terms that, if the hirer should pay a certain sum by a series of such monthly instalments, the piano should become his property, but that until the full amount was paid it should remain the property of the owner. It was further agreed that the hirer should not let the piano go out of his possession, and that he might terminate the hiring by delivering up the piano to the owner. B. obtained possession of the piano, and paid some of the instalments, but, before the full amount agreed upon was paid, he pledged the piano with the respondents without notice of the appellant's claim. In an action by the appellant to recover the piano from the respondents,

Held: an agreement to buy imported an obligation to buy; on the true construction of the present contract B. was not under any obligation to pay the stipulated number of instalments and become the purchaser of the piano; he had a mere option to buy, and, by returning the piano, he could put an end to the contract whenever he wished; therefore, he had not "bought or agreed to buy" the piano within s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and so he was unable to give the respondents a good title under that section, and the appellant was entitled to succeed.

A May 30, 1895. The following opinions were read.

B LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The appellant was the owner of a piano, of which he had given possession to one Charles Brewster, under an agreement in writing of Dec. 23, 1892, to the terms of which I shall have occasion to refer immediately. On July 21, 1893, Brewster, improperly and without the consent of the C appellant, pledged the piano with the respondents, who are pawnbrokers, as security for an advance. The appellant, upon discovering this, demanded the piano from the respondents, and, on their refusing to deliver it, brought an action of trover. The defence set up by the respondents was that they had received the piano from Brewster in good faith and without notice of any claim on the part of the appellant, and that Brewster having "bought or agreed to buy" it from him, they were protected by s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889. The county court judge held that the defence was not proved, and his judgment was upheld by the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench. The Court of Appeal, however, came to the conclusion that the defence had been established, and reversed the judgment of the Divisional Court.

D The only question is whether the respondents have made out that Brewster had bought or agreed to buy the piano. This depends upon the true effect of the agreement under which he obtained it. By that agreement Brewster, called therein the hirer, agreed to pay the "owner" on Dec. 23, 1892, a rent or hire instalment of 10s. 6d., and 10s. 6d. on the 23rd of each succeeding month, and to keep the instrument in the hirer's own custody at the address named in the agreement, and not to remove the same without the owner's previous consent in writing. He E further agreed that if the hiring should be terminated by him under a subsequent clause of the agreement, and the instrument returned to the owner, the hirer should remain liable to the owner for arrears of hire up to the date of the return, and should not be entitled to any allowance, credit, return, or set-off for payments previously made. The owner, on the other hand, agreed that the hirer might F terminate the hiring by delivering up the instrument to the owner, and, further, that if the hirer should punctually pay the full sum of eighteen guineas, by 10s. 6d. at the date of signing and by thirty-five monthly instalments of 10s. 6d. in advance as aforesaid, the instrument should become the sole and absolute property of the hirer. It was also agreed that unless and until the full sum of eighteen guineas was paid the instrument should be and continue the sole property of the owner.

G It is said that the substance of the transaction evidenced by the agreement must be looked at, and not its mere words. I quite agree. But the substance must, of course, be ascertained by a consideration of the rights and obligations of the parties, to be derived from a consideration of the whole of the agreement. If Brewster agreed to buy the piano the parties cannot, by calling it a hiring, or by any mere juggling with words, escape from the consequences of the contract into which they H entered. What then, was the real nature of the transaction? The answer to this question is not, I think, involved in any difficulty. Brewster was to obtain possession of the piano and to be entitled to its use so long as he paid the plaintiff the stipulated sum of 10s. 6d. a month, and he was bound to make these monthly payments so long as he retained possession of the piano. If he continued to make them at the appointed times for the period of three years the piano was to become I his property, but he might at any time return it, and, upon doing so, would no longer be liable to make any further payment beyond the monthly sum then due.

I cannot, with all respect, concur in the view of the Court of Appeal that, upon the true construction of the agreement, Brewster had "agreed to buy" the piano. An agreement to buy imports a legal obligation to buy. If there was no such legal obligation there cannot, in my opinion, properly be said to have been an agreement to buy. Where is any such legal obligation to be found? Brewster might buy or not just as he pleased. He did not agree to make thirty-six or any number of monthly payments. All that he undertook was to make the monthly payment of 10s. 6d. so long as he kept the piano. He had an option, no doubt, to buy it A by continuing the stipulated payments for a sufficient length of time. If he had exercised that option he would have become the purchaser. I cannot see, under these circumstances, how he can be said either to have bought or agreed to buy the piano. The terms of the contract did not, upon its execution, bind him to buy, but left him free to do so or not as he pleased, and nothing happened after the contract was made to impose that obligation. The Master of the Rolls said : B

“It is a contract by the seller to sell, and a contract by the purchaser, if he does not change his mind, to buy; and, if this agreement goes on to its end, it ends in a purchase. Therefore, it seems to me that the true and proper construction of this instrument, after all, is this—it is an agreement by the one to sell, and an agreement by the other to buy, but with an option on the part C of the buyer if he changes his mind to put an end to the contract.”

I cannot think that an agreement to buy, “if he does not change his mind,” is any agreement to buy at all in the eye of the law. If it rests with me to do or not to do a certain thing at a future time, according to the then state of my mind,
I cannot be said to have contracted to do it.

It appears to me that the contract in question was in reality a contract of hiring, D and not in name or pretence only. But for the provision that if the hirer punctually paid the 10s. 6d. a month for thirty-six months, the piano should be his property, it could not be doubted that it was a mere agreement for its hire, and I cannot see how the fact that this provision was added made it any the less a contract of hiring until that condition had been fulfilled. I think it very likely that both E parties thought it would probably end in a purchase, but this is far from showing that it was an agreement to buy. The monthly payments were no doubt somewhat higher than they would have been if the agreement had contained no such provision.
One can well conceive cases, however, in which a person who had not made up his mind to continue the payment for three years, would nevertheless enter into such an agreement. It might be worth his while to make somewhat larger monthly F payments for the use of the piano in order that he might enjoy that option if he chose to exercise it. In such a case how could it be said that he had agreed to buy when he had not only come under no obligation to buy, but had not even made up his mind to do so? The agreement is, in its terms, just as applicable to such a case as to one where the hirer had resolved to continue the payments for the three years, and it must be construed upon a consideration of the obligations which its G terms create, and not upon a mere speculation as to what was contemplated, or what would probably be done under it.

It was said in the Court of Appeal that there was an agreement by the appellant to sell, and that an agreement to sell connotes an agreement to buy. This is undoubtedly true if the words “agreement to sell” be used in their strict legal sense; but when a person has, for valuable consideration, bound himself to sell to H another on certain terms, if the other chooses to avail himself of the binding offer, he may, in popular language, be said to have agreed to sell, though an agreement to sell in this sense which is in truth merely an offer which cannot be withdrawn, certainly does not connote an agreement to buy, and it is only in this sense that there can be said to have been an agreement to sell in the present case.

It was argued for the respondents that the case came within the mischief intended I to be provided against by s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and that the enactment ought, therefore, to be so construed as to cover it. I can see no reason for thus straining the language of the enactment. A person who is in possession of a piano under such an agreement as that which existed in the present case is no more its apparent owner than if he had merely hired it, and in the latter case any one taking it as security would have no claim to hold it as against the owner. Reliance was placed on the decision in Lee v. Butler (1), and it was said that the present case was not, in principle, distinguishable from it. There seems to me to be the

A broadest distinction between the two cases. There was there an agreement to buy. The purchase money was to be paid in two instalments; but as soon as the agreement was entered into, there was an absolute obligation to pay both of them, which might have been enforced by action. The person who obtained the goods could not insist upon returning them and so absolve himself from any obligation to make further payment. Unless there was a breach of contract by the party who engaged to make the payments the transaction necessarily resulted in a sale. That there was in that case an agreement to buy appears to me, as it did to the Court of Appeal, to be beyond question. It was further urged for the respondents that when Brewster pledged the piano with them it became impossible for him to return it to the appellant, and he became, therefore from that time bound to make the stipulated payment and to become the purchaser. I cannot accede to this argument. In my opinion, it is impossible to hold that Brewster, having only a right under the contract to buy, provided he complied with the prescribed conditions, could convert himself into a purchaser as against the owner by violating the conditions of the contract. I think the judgment appealed from must be reversed.

ID

LORD WATSON.—This case depends upon the construction of an agreement made on Dec. 23, 1892, between the appellant and one Charles Brewster, in terms of which a piano belonging to the appellant was on that date delivered to Brewster. On July 21, 1893, while the instrument was admittedly the property of the appellant, Brewster gave it in pawn to the respondents for the sum of £4 10s. The present action was then brought by the appellant against the respondents in the county court of Middlesex for recovery of the piano or its value. The defence set up by the respondents, which has occasioned this litigation, is, that at the date of pawning Brewster was in possession of the piano under an agreement for its purchase, and was, therefore, in a position to make an effectual pledge to them under s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, is not being disputed that they received the pledge in good faith, and without notice of the appellant's right. In these circumstances the case is narrowed to the single question whether the possession of Brewster was attributable to a contract of purchase, as the respondents maintain, or to a contract of hiring, as contended for by the appellant. The county court judge held Brewster's possession to have been that of a hirer, and, in the Divisional Court, the same view was taken by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and DAY, J. In the Court of Appeal, LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and DAVEY, L.JJ., were all of opinion that the agreement constituted a contract of sale and purchase, and they, accordingly, reversed the decisions of the courts below, and gave judgment for the respondents.

The terms of the agreement are exceedingly simple; and had it not been for the conflict of judicial opinion which they have provoked it would not have occurred to me that their true character and substance admitted of much doubt. The only stipulations which are of materiality to the present question are these. Brewster undertakes to pay a monthly rent or hire instalment of 10s. 6d., commencing on Dec. 23, 1892, subject to the condition that he may terminate the hiring at any time by delivering up the piano to the appellant. In the event of the hiring being so terminated he is to remain liable to the owner for arrears of hire up to the date when the piano is returned. Then follows a stipulation to the effect that :

“If the hirer shall punctually pay the full sum of £18 18s., by 10s. 6d. at date of signing and by thirty-five monthly instalments of 10s. 6d. in advance as aforesaid, the said instrument shall become the sole and absolute property of the hirer.”

These stipulations, in my opinion, constitute neither more nor less than a contract of hiring, terminable at the will of the hirer, coupled with this condition in his favour—that if he shall elect to retain it until he has made thirty-six monthly payments as they fall due the piano is then to become his property. The only obligation which is laid upon him is to pay the stipulated monthly hire so long as he chooses to keep the piano. In other words, he is at liberty to determine the contract in the usual way, by returning the thing hired to its owner. He is under no obligation to purchase the thing or to pay a price for it. There is no purchase and no agreement for purchase until the hirer actually exercises the option given him.

The respondents' counsel endeavoured to assimilate this case to Lee v. Butler (1), but in reality the two cases differ essentially. In Lee v. Butler (1) the so-called hirer was bound absolutely to make payment of £1 on May 6 and of £96 4s. on Aug. 1, 1892, which sums were described as "rent for the hire or use" of certain furniture, which was the subject-matter of the agreement, it being declared that upon due payment of these rents, amounting to £97 4s., the furniture was to be the sole and absolute property of the hirer. It appears to me to have been rightly held that Mrs. Lloyd, the hirer, had truly agreed to purchase the furniture, and could, therefore, give a good title to a bona fide purchaser. Her legal obligation to pay the price attached as soon as the agreement was executed. Apart from the arrangement for hire of the piano, the only right given to Brewster by the agreement in question was the option to become a purchaser. It is true that, while he was under no obligation to buy, the appellant was legally bound to give him that option, and could not retract it if the other stipulations of the contract were duly observed by the hirer. But the possession of such a right of option was in no sense an agreement by Brewster to buy the piano; and the appellant's obligation to give the option was not, in the sense of law, an agreement by him to sell. In order to constitute an agreement for sale and purchase there must be two parties who are mutually bound by it. From a legal point of view the appellant was in exactly the same position as if he had made an offer to sell on certain terms, and had undertaken to keep it open for a definite period. Until acceptance by the person to whom the offer is made, there can be no contract to buy. So long as the agreement stood unaltered, there could, in this case, be no contract to purchase by Brewster until he had complied with the terms of the option given him, and had duly made the thirty-six monthly payments which it prescribes as the condition of his becoming owner of the piano. The distinction between a pre-contract of that kind and a proper agreement for the sale and purchase of goods does not appear to me to have been sufficiently regarded by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. Their Lordships seemed to have assumed that, because the appellant had bound himself to sell if Brewster chose to buy upon the terms prescribed, he was in reality a seller; and that the existence of a seller necessarily implied the existence of a buyer. In my opinion, that reasoning is inconclusive. While, in popular language, the appellant's obligation might be described as an agreement to sell, it is in law nothing more than a binding offer to sell. There can, in such a case, be no agreement to buy, within the meaning of the Act of 1889, until the purchaser has exercised the option given him in terms of the agreement.

Another argument was urged for the respondents, which I find thus succinctly stated in their fifth reason of appeal: "That upon Brewster pledging the pianoforte with the respondents he put it out of his power to exercise his right to determine the agreement by returning the pianoforte, and thereby the agreement to purchase became absolute and unconditional." The argument is, in my opinion, untenable. In a question with the appellant, Brewster could not become purchaser of the instrument, except upon the condition of his observing the stipulations of the agreement, and making regular payment of each monthly instalment until Nov. 23, 1895, which he was under no obligation to do. By the act of pawning he violated these stipulations, and that dishonest act, which was committed after he had paid only seven out of thirty-six instalments, is not calculated to suggest that he entertained any intention of becoming purchaser of the piano. It is quite true that Brewster thereby put it out of his power (at least until he could raise the amount

A for which it was pawned) to return the piano to the appellant; but he, at the same time, broke his contract, and forfeited his right to exercise the option of purchase given him by the agreement. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored.

B LORD MACNAGHTEN. In this case I think that his Honour Judge Bacon took the right view. It seems to me that the agreement under consideration means what it says, and can mean nothing more. It is an agreement not forbidden by law, not unintelligible, and not, I think, unreasonable. I rather doubt whether the meaning of the parties can be better elucidated, or their relative position more clearly defined, by speaking of an "option," or of a "defeasance," or by translating their contract into other and more formal language. At least I am unable to express the obvious intention of the parties in simpler or plainer words than those which they have used.

D The musical instrument dealer let out a piano by the month, and undertook to sell it to the customer who hired it conditionally on his making a certain number of monthly payments. But it was the intention of the parties—an intention expressed on the face of the contract itself—that no one of those monthly payments until the very last in the series was reached, nor all of them put together without the last, should confer upon the customer any proprietary right in the piano, or any interest in the nature of a lien, or any interest of any sort or kind beyond the right to keep the instrument and use it for a month to come. The customer was under no obligation to fulfil the conditions on which—and on which alone—the dealer undertook to sell. He was not bound to keep the piano for a single day, or a single hour. He was no more bound to purchase it after he had signed the agreement than he was before. The contract as it seems to me on the part of the dealer, was a contract of hiring, coupled with a conditional contract or undertaking to sell. On the part of the customer it was a contract of hiring only until the time came for making the last payment. It may be that, at the inception of the transaction, both parties expected that the agreement would run its full course, and that the piano would change hands in the end. But an expectation, however confident and however well-founded, does not amount to an agreement, and even an agreement between two parties operative only during the pleasure of one is no agreement on his part at law.

G The learned counsel for the respondents spoke of dealings of this sort with an air of righteous indignation as if they were traps for the extravagant and the impecunious—mere devices to tempt improvident people into buying things which they do not want, and for which at the time they cannot pay. I think that is going too far. I do not see why a person fairly solvent and tolerably prudent should not make himself the owner of a piano, or a carriage, or anything else by means of periodical payments on such terms as those in question in the present case. The advantages are not all on one side. If the object of desire loses its attractions on closer acquaintance—if faults are developed or defects discovered—if a coveted treasure is becoming a burden and an encumbrance, it is something surely to know that the transaction may be closed at once without further liability, and without the payment of any forfeit. If these agreements are objectionable on public grounds it is for Parliament to interfere. It is not for the courts to put a forced or strained construction on a written document, or to import a meaning which the parties never dreamed of, because it may not wholly approve of transactions of this sort.

Lee v. Butler (1), on which the Court of Appeal relied, was a very different case. There a person, who got some furniture under an agreement which was called "a hire-purchase agreement," was bound by the terms of the agreement to pay for and purchase the furniture. I do not see how Lee v. Butler (1) can be an authority for the respondent's contention. Nor can I understand why the customer in the present case should be taken to have agreed to purchase the piano which he hired because he fraudulently pledged it, and so put it out of his power to return it without redeeming the pledge. I agree that the judgment under appeal should be reversed. A

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion. The right of the defendant to refuse delivery of the piano in question under s. 9 of the Factors Act depends on his being able to show that Brewster, in whose possession it was, had either bought it or agreed to buy it from Mr. Helby, the plaintiff and appellant, and the decision of this question depends entirely on the true construction of the agreement between the plaintiff and Brewster, under which the latter got possession of the instrument. It is true that, by that agreement Brewster undertook to pay to the appellant not only the first instalment of 10s. 6d. described as a “rent or hire instalment,” but to pay the same amount on the 23rd of each succeeding month, and that it was provided that on the payment of thirty-six monthly instalments the piano should become his property. B C

If these stipulations had been unqualified there would have been an absolute obligation or agreement by Brewster to acquire the instrument in property, and by purchase, although the instalments were described as for rent or hire, and Lee v. Butler (1) would have directly applied. But the whole obligations by Brewster were qualified by the stipulation “that the hirer may terminate the hiring by delivering up to the owner the said instrument.” This provision appears to me to make it clear that there was no purchase and no agreement to purchase. The hirer need not continue the hiring a day longer than he desired; and he need not allow the transaction to become one of purchase unless he desired to do so. An agreement to purchase would infer an obligation to pay a price the payment of which could be enforced by action, while here it is plain that no action for any balance of the alleged price could be maintained if Brewster thought fit at any time to return the instrument to its owner. The substance of the transaction was a hiring of the piano, for the use of which monthly instalments were to be paid, with a provision that the arrangement might ultimately result in a purchase, but that this should be entirely at the option of the hirer and should depend entirely on his thinking fit to make payment of thirty-six monthly instalments. The contract of hiring only was to cease at his option on the instrument being returned to the owner. D E F

It was maintained that under the general words of the undertaking to pay future instalments there was an agreement to purchase within the meaning of the Factors Act, although there was power to resolve the agreement or to bring it to an end by returning the instrument. It seems to me to be very difficult to hold that, even if in form the agreement could be correctly thus described, this would satisfy the provision of the Factors Act, which it has been forcibly maintained requires an absolute obligation to purchase and pay a price—or, at least, an obligation which is not merely dependent on the will or wish of the alleged purchaser. In this case, however, I think there was an agreement of hiring only with an option to the hirer to become the purchaser; and that although there was an obligation to sell if the hirer should avail himself of the right of option to purchase, there was no obligation or agreement to purchase. I cannot hold that there is such an agreement on the part of one who having the beneficial use of the property of another agrees to pay instalments described as rent or hire instalments, and which he is entitled to treat as payments for hire only—because it is also stipulated that by continuing to make the payments for a certain time he shall acquire the property—he having at the same time the power at any moment and at his own will by returning the property to the owner, to put an end to any obligation to pay any further instalments. Hire-Purchase--Sale of goods--Passing of property--Payment by instalments--Bankruptcy of hirer--Provision in agreement that goods should remain property of sellers until all instalments paid.

By an agreement between the respondents and one P. the respondents supplied an engine to P. upon the terms that P. was to pay a certain sum down, and the balance of the purchase money by eight quarterly instalments. The agreement provided that until all the instalments were paid P. should not sell, assign, or remove the engine without the consent of the respondents; that, if the instalments fell into arrear, the respondents might sue for the whole amount, or might resume possession of the engine and sell it, paying over to P. the amount of the price received by them, if any, beyond what was due to them; and that until all the instalments were paid the engine should remain the property of the respondents. P. allowed the instalments to fall into arrear, and became bankrupt, and the official assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy claimed possession of the engine.

Held: on its true construction the agreement was one of sale and purchase, but the property in the subject-matter of the agreement remained throughout in the vendor, and, therefore, the claim of the official assignees failed.

Per LORD WATSON: Although the words "lessors" and "hirer" are used, and the word "rent" also occurs, it is plain that the agreement is one of sale and purchase, and nothing else. But it does not in the least follow that the property in the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract has passed to the purchaser. That is a question which entirely depends on the intention of the parties. The law permits them to settle the point for themselves by any expression of their intention upon the point.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (LORD CHANCELLOR WALKER, FITZGIBBON and BARRY, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of the judge of the Bankruptcy Court (BOYD, J.).

The appellants were the official assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, A and assignees of the estate and effects of Thomas Frederick Peel, who was adjudicated a bankrupt in the Irish Bankruptcy Court in 1893.

At the commencement of the bankruptcy the bankrupt had in his possession an "Otto" gas-engine, which had been supplied to him by the respondents, Crossley Bros., Ltd., who carried on business in Manchester as engineers, and part of whose business consisted in supplying gas-engines to persons on the hire-purchase B system. In June, 1892, they supplied the engine in question to the bankrupt under an agreement by the terms of which the engine was to become the property of the bankrupt on his paying the sum of £240 by instalments, but was in the meantime to remain the property of the respondents, who were empowered, on a failure to pay any of the instalments, either to sue for the unpaid balance or to demand the return of the engine. The bankrupt paid one instalment of £60, C but failed to pay the remaining instalments. After the bankruptcy of the hirer the respondents demanded back the engine, but their right to do so was disputed by the appellants. In the Bankruptcy Court it was contended, on behalf of the respondents, that under the agreement the property in the gas-engine remained in them, and that the bankrupt had no more than the use of the engine, and that the custom of hiring with option of purchase was sufficiently notorious to exclude the application of the law of reputed ownership. On behalf of the assignees it was contended, among other things, that the real relation between the parties was not that of owner and hirer of the engine, but that of seller and buyer, with a prescribed mode of payment by instalments. At the conclusion of the case the learned judge gave judgment refusing the motion with costs, on the ground that the agreement between Crossley Bros. and the bankrupt was in its true character a sale and E purchase, and not a hire of the gas-engine. The Irish Court of Appeal set aside that judgment on the ground that the contention of the present respondents was correct. The assignees appealed.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Muir Mackenzie, and Doyle (the last-named of the Irish Bar) for the appellants.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and C. A. Russell for the respondents, were not called on to argue. F

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—I confess that this appears to me to be a very plain case indeed. An agreement was entered into on June 23, 1892, between the respondents and Mr. Thomas Frederick Peel, under which Mr. Peel obtained G possession of an "Otto" gas-engine, the property of the respondents. Mr. Peel afterwards became bankrupt, and the appellants are his assignees. I shall have to call your Lordships' attention in detail to the terms of that agreement, but put shortly it was to this effect, that Peel should pay Messrs. Crossley £60 before delivery and the balance, making in all £240, in eight quarterly payments. At the time when he became bankrupt several of the payments then due had not H been paid, and the question is whether the assignees can claim this gas-engine as against Messrs. Crossley, or whether they are entitled to resume possession of it as owners.

The agreement between the parties must be construed in precisely the same way as if there had been no bankruptcy at all, and, apart from any statutory provision, the assignees in bankruptcy only succeed to the rights of the bankrupt, and have I no higher or greater rights. The assignees, of course, could not successfully contend that under this agreement Mr. Peel could have insisted, as against Messrs. Crossley, on retaining possession of this engine without paying the sum, or what was necessary to make up the sum, of £240, and, therefore, at common law the assignees would be in no better position. There are, so far as I know, only two statutory provisions which, in such a case as this, could give the assignees a better right than the bankrupt. One of them is the provision of the Bankruptcy Act known as the "reputed ownership clause" [now s. 38 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act,

A 1914], that is to say, that, if the goods, although the goods of Messrs. Crossley, were in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt, though the bankrupt could not have claimed a right to retain them as against Messrs. Crossley, the assignees can. That was the question argued in the courts below. The present appellants there insisted upon their right to the engine under the reputed ownership clause of the Bankruptcy Act. That was decided against them. They have abandoned any
B claim to it on this appeal, and, therefore, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are out of the case.

The only other statute which could give the assignees a better right under the bankruptcy is the Bills of Sale Act; and, under the Bills of Sale Act, if a bankrupt has in his possession goods which are the property of any other person, there is no doubt that, although the bankrupt has transferred the property to that other person, C or given that other person rights in the nature of rights of property over it, if the goods remain in his possession, and he becomes bankrupt, his assignees in the bankruptcy can claim the property, disregarding all the rights which he has given, unless the instrument carrying out the transaction (if it has been carried out by an instrument) has been registered as a bill of sale. But, of course, in order to make out that the assignees have a title to this engine under the Bills of Sale Act, it is
D absolutely essential to prove that the property in the engine, at some time or other, passed to the bankrupt. If the property never passed to the bankrupt, he can never have conveyed it or assigned it, or given the right to seize, or have given any of the rights over it within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act. The Bills of Sale Act relates to assurances, or assignments, or rights to seize, given or conferred by the person who owns the property. Here, if the true view is that the property
E in this gas-engine has never been out of Messrs Crossley, then the bankruptcy of Peel cannot affect their title in any manner or shape, and the property must still remain in them, and all the rights under the agreement must remain.

That necessitates an examination of the agreement. It seems to me that the only question in this case is: "Did the property in this gas-engine pass at any time from Messrs. Crossley to Mr. Peel?" Coming, then, to the examination of F the agreement, I quite concede that the agreement must be regarded as a whole; its substance must be looked at. The parties cannot by the insertion of any mere words defeat the effect of the transaction as appearing from the whole of the agreement into which they have entered. If the words in one part of it point in one direction, and the words in another part in another direction, we must look
G at the agreement as a whole and see what its substantial effect is. But there is no such thing as seems to have been argued here, as looking at the substance apart from looking at all the language which the parties have used. It is only by a study of the whole of the language that the substance can be ascertained. The agreement begins with a provision that "the lessee will pay to the owners and lessors as and for rent . . . £60 cash before delivery, and the balance in eight equal and consecutive quarterly payments," amounting in the aggregate to £240.
H The lessee agrees to take all proper care of the gas-engine, and to pay the rent of the premises on which it is, and that he "will not in any way sell, assign, or sublet, or otherwise part with the possession of the 'Otto' gas-engine, or assume the ownership, or remove the same from one building to another, without first informing the owners and lessors of such intended removal, and receiving their consent in writing so to do, so long as any of the said sums shall remain unpaid, and will not make any alteration or addition to the said 'Otto' gas-engine, or allow the same to be made, without the consent in writing of the owners and lessors, and that upon payment by the lessee of the several sums aforesaid, then this agreement shall be at an end, and the said 'Otto' gas-engine shall become the property of the lessee as purchaser thereof for the sum of £240 so to be paid as aforesaid, but until the several sums shall have been fully paid, together with insurance, repairs (if any), and other costs and expenses, legal or otherwise, connected therewith.

the said 'Otto' gas-engine shall remain the sole and absolute property of the owners and lessors, it being hereby expressly agreed and declared that the said 'Otto' gas-engine is only let on hire to the lessee until all sums of money due under this agreement are paid."

I stop there to observe that the parties have in terms expressed the intention that the property in this gas-engine should not pass until all the instalments have been paid.

Upon an agreement to sell, it depends upon the intention of the parties whether the property passes or does not pass. Here the parties have in terms expressed their intention, and said that the property shall not pass until the full purchase money is paid. I know no reason to prevent that being a perfectly lawful agreement. If that was really the intention of the parties, I know of no rule or principle of law which prevents it from being given effect to. I quite agree that if, although the parties have inserted a provision to that effect, they have shown in other parts of the agreement, by the language which they have used, or the provisions which they have made, that they intended the property to pass, one must look at the transaction as a whole, and it might be necessary to hold that the property has passed, although the parties have said that their intention was that it should not, because they have provided that it shall. No doubt any provisions which were inconsistent with the intention that the property should not pass would be given effect to in preference to a mere expression of intention in words. That is a proposition which I shall not dispute for a moment, and if the appellants could have pointed here to any provision in this deed inconsistent with the intention that the property should remain in the vendors, I think that they might very likely have succeeded, notwithstanding that the parties had in terms said what their intention was. If the matter of intention were even doubtful, great weight would be given to what the parties have stated their intention to be. But, in the present case, I confess that I am unable to find any provision in this deed inconsistent with the intention which the parties have said was theirs. If the instalments are not paid as provided for, or if the hirer, or intended purchaser, or whatever he may be called, becomes bankrupt, then there is a provision in the agreement as to what shall happen. Messrs. Crossley may in that case elect to sue for the remainder of the instalments, to treat them all as at once payable and sue for them. No doubt, if they take that course, they then elect to have the purchase completed. They could not sue for the purchase money while they insisted that the property in the goods, the price of which they were suing for, had not passed.

But that is only one of certain alternative courses which are open to Messrs. Crossley. They may, instead of suing for the balance of the price and treating it then and there as a sale at that price then due, resume possession. I would observe that in all the subsequent clauses, which clearly contemplate the property being in them, the only word used with reference to their action is "resuming possession"; nothing is said about any transfer of the property. It is assumed that on the resumption of possession there will be in them both possession and property. On the resumption of possession they may pursue one of two alternative courses. They may, if they like, sell; and if they sell, and if on the sale the engine produces more than enough to pay everything that would be due in any event to Messrs. Crossley, and leaves a surplus, then Messrs. Crossley undertake by the agreement to pay that surplus to Mr. Peel, the bankrupt. But that is not the only course which they may pursue. It is absolutely at their option whether they do that or not. They may simply resume possession of the engine, and having resumed possession they may sue the bankrupt for the damages which they have sustained by the non-performance of the provisions of this agreement, or they may prove for them as liquidated damages.

The distinction is as well settled as it possibly can be between a debt for the price of goods the property in which has passed, and an action of damages for breach of a contract to buy and pay for the goods. In the former case, the debt due is the balance of the price, the purchaser keeping the goods. In the other case the vendor retains possession of the goods, but he sues for the damages that he has sustained by the purchaser not carrying out his agreement to buy as stipulated. This agreement provides that he may either sue for them, if there has not been a bankruptcy, or prove for them if there has been a bankruptcy. But suing or proving for those damages implies of course that the property as well as the possession is still in the vendor. So far from finding in this agreement anything that was counter to the expressed intention of the parties that the property should throughout remain in the vendor, everything, to my mind, seems to point in that direction. Great reliance was placed upon the provision with reference to the sale of the engine. Counsel for appellants said that that was putting the vendors in the position of mortgagees. It seems to me not to be a position inconsistent with the provision which the parties stated was their intention. There seems to me nothing inconsistent with that in an agreement by the vendor that, if he does resume possession, and if he does sell, and if he does on the sale get more than the stipulated price, he will not keep it, but will pay the balance to the intending purchaser. That is a perfectly lawful agreement for the parties to come to.

But it is to be observed that, if he sells, and the engine produces on the sale less than what would be due from Mr. Peel, there is no provision that he can recover the balance. His only course, if he contemplated such a result, would be to determine not to sell, but to keep possession and to sue for damages for breach of contract, or to prove for such damages. Therefore, when the agreement is looked at as a whole, I can find nothing to prevent effect being given to the expressed intention of the parties that the property in this engine should not pass. I know of nothing to prevent such a contract as that being made, or having full effect given to it. If a contract of that description is within the mischief of the Bills of Sale Act, then the Bills of Sale Act needs amendment. It seems to me impossible to bring this case within the Bills of Sale Act because the transaction may bear a resemblance to a transaction which would be within it on the ground that it is within its mischief, when the initial step to bringing the Bills of Sale Act into operation at all seems to me to fail, namely, that there should have been an assurance, or an assignment, or a licence to seize, or any of the other matters referred to in the Bills of Sale Act, given by the bankrupt to some other person.

With regard to Coburn v. Collins (1), upon which reliance was placed, that seems to me to be a very different case from the present one. That was an agreement for the sale of a business, the price of which no doubt was to be paid at a future time. There was no agreement between the parties in that case that the property should not pass at once. There were none of the stipulations one finds here as to the use of that which was the subject of the agreement to sell. In this case the intending purchaser cannot sell, assign, sub-let, or even remove from one building to another, this gas-engine, the property in which is supposed to be in him; in Coburn v. Collins (1) it was the sale of a business where the purchaser was intending to continue the business and to sell the stock-in-trade—two contracts of a very different nature. In the next place there, in terms, the vendors were to have a lien or charge, implying that the property had passed to others, for a man does not have a lien on his own property or a charge either. Therefore, in that case, there were provisions in the agreement which pointed to the intention being that the substance of the transaction was a sale in which the property passed, with a security, eo instanti, given by the purchaser to the vendor. That decision does not seem to me to be in the slightest degree inconsistent with the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived in the present case. I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I agree with your Lordships that in this appeal no cause has been shown for disturbing the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland. As is usual in cases of this kind, we have heard a great deal in the course of the appellants' argument of the necessity of attending to the substance of the agreement which we have to construe. That is a canon of construction applicable to all agreements; but in its application to an agreement it must always be borne in mind that the substance of the agreement must ultimately be found in the language of the contract itself. The duty of a court is to consider every part of the agreement, every stipulation which it contains, and to consider their mutual bearing upon each other; but it is entirely beyond the function of a court to discard the plain meaning of a term in the agreement unless there can be found within its four corners other language and other stipulations which necessarily rob the stipulation of its primary meaning.

In this case the substance of the agreement, to my mind, does not admit of much doubt, although the words "lessors" and "hirer" are used, and the word "rent" also occurs, it is plain that the agreement is one of sale and purchase, and nothing else. To that extent my opinion entirely coincides with that expressed by the learned judge of first instance. But a finding that the contract in this case is one of sale and purchase is not sufficient for the argument of the appellants; because it does not in the least follow that, because there is an agreement of sale and purchase, the property in the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract has passed to the purchaser. That is a question which entirely depends upon the intention of the parties. The law permits them to settle the point for themselves by any expression of their intention upon the point. In this case the matter is not left to implication; because, if there be one point on the face of this contract clearer than another, it is that the intention of the parties was that the seller should not part with his dominium over the thing which he was selling, and that the property should not become vested in the purchaser until the last farthing of the price was paid. If there had been in the deed language to be found which showed that the parties were using those expressions inadvertently, or that they had entered into other stipulations which were in substance contrary to the expressed intention, the case would have been otherwise. They might, for instance, have given power to the purchaser to exercise a right which implied dominium before the contractual term of the passing of the property arrived. But there is no case of that kind here. There are no such stipulations to be found in the agreement. The whole of the stipulations of the agreement appear to me to be in entire conformity with the expressed intention of the parties.

Moreover, I may add that, in my opinion, the remedies given to the unpaid vendor are far more appropriate to the case of an undivested seller than to the case of a mortgagee which was said to be his true position. I need not, after the criticism of the Lord Chancellor, enter any further into the terms of this contract. I shall only say in conclusion that I find it impossible to attach the construction to it which was contended for by the appellants, without taking out of the contract plain words which are to be found in it, and inserting in lieu of them words to a different effect, which are not to be found in it.

LORD ASHBOURNE. I entirely concur. Notwithstanding the ingenious arguments addressed to your Lordships in this case on behalf of the appellants, and notwithstanding the respect which I entertain for the ability and experience of Boyd, J., I am clearly and strongly of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in this case was absolutely correct on all points. The question turns upon the construction of this agreement, not upon a suggestion that may be drawn from the construction of other agreements; and I can see no considerations of public policy, and no considerations of inconvenience in the administration of bankruptcy law in Ireland or elsewhere, that should induce us specially to favour the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the appellants. On the construction of this agreement I can see no room for any reasonable doubt. The parties expressed what they desired to be their contract in language of reasonable clearness, and, in my opinion, their intentions are expressed in a way that leaves no room for

A doubt. I have read with attention the judgment in the Court of Appeal, and I think that the words that appear at the end of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland express the position here accurately, and I myself am willing entirely to adopt them :

B “I cannot come to the conclusion that the property passed where, upon the whole agreement—and I am bound to construe it as a whole—that result would be contrary to the express intention of the parties.”

I entirely agree with the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and I am clearly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

C LORD SHAND.—I entertain the same opinion as your Lordships in reference to this appeal. In the court below there seems to have been a full argument upon another ground, which has not been argued here—I mean the ground of the reputed ownership of this engine. That has been abandoned in the argument before your Lordships. But it was maintained, apparently I think, repeating an argument which is mentioned by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, as the second branch of the grounds upon which the official assignees maintain their right to this gas-engine, in these words :

“The assignees however mainly rested their case upon the other ground, that on which BOYD, J., founded his order, viz., that the agreement of June 23, 1892, was in reality an agreement for purchase, vesting the property in the bankrupt at once, or at all events when the first instalment became overdue.”

E His Lordship adds : “And that it was unreasonable and contrary to the policy of the bankruptcy laws.” In the argument at your Lordships’ Bar, the point that has been maintained is that it was a violation of the Bills of Sale Act, which is in precisely the same terms in Ireland as in this country. The point, as I understand it, that was made was this. By the agreement it was alleged that the bankrupt having become the owner of the gas-engine in dispute, while retaining possession of it attempted to create a charge on it in favour of the vendors, and the agreement was thus in substance a bill of sale by the bankrupt, which was invalid because it was never registered. Having heard all the criticisms that have been offered upon the terms of that agreement, I am entirely of opinion, with your Lordships, that in substance it cannot be regarded as a bill of sale. It is conceded that, in order to succeed in the argument, the appellant must show that the bankrupt became the owner, and, therefore, was in a position to grant a bill of sale; but the whole terms of the agreement seem to me to exclude the notion that he was to be the owner. The engine was to be held by him with plates affixed to it, stating that Messrs. Crossley Bros. were the owners; the price was to be paid by instalments extending over a period of two years; and this very reasonable and natural stipulation was part of the agreement, that until that price should be paid the ownership should not change, and that Messrs. Crossley Bros. should continue to be the owners. If they were the owners, there is an end to this argument. I can only further say that I entirely concur in the view that in none of the other stipulations of this agreement which have formed the subject of comment is there anything to contradict or render inoperative that clause which says that the property in this engine is to remain with the vendors until the price is fully paid.

I I am, therefore, of opinion, with your Lordships, that the appeal fails.

Domicil—Marriage—Dissolution—Jurisdiction—Court of the domicil—Insufficiency of “matrimonial domicil”

According to international law the domicil for the time being of married persons affords the only true jurisdiction to dissolve their marriage. Such jurisdiction is not conferred by a “matrimonial domicil” based on a residence which, though not “casual or that of a traveller,” is not of sufficient permanence to enable the parties to acquire a true domicil.

Appeal by the husband, a member of the Ceylon Civil Service, against a decision of the Supreme Court of the Island (LAWRIE, Acting C.J., and BROWNE, J.), who had reversed a decision of the judge of the District Court of Matara (SAUNDERS, J.), who granted a decree nisi for a divorce in a suit brought by the husband against his wife, on the ground of her adultery with the other respondents. The decree nisi was afterwards made absolute.

June 29, 1895. LORD WATSON.— In February, 1883, the appellant, who is a member of the Ceylon Civil Service, was married in England to a French lady, the leading respondent in this appeal, who will hereinafter be referred to as "the respondent." From the date of their marriage, until the commencement of this suit, the spouses had their principal residence in Ceylon, where the appellant was necessarily detained by his official duties. In July, 1892, he was assistant government agent of the district of Matara; and on July 12 he brought the present action before the District Court of Matara, against his wife and three other defendants, praying for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and other remedies, upon the allegation that she had committed adultery with one of these defendants in the year 1887, with another of them in the year 1889, and with the third of them at various times between May, 1891, and April, 1892. Except on the last of these occasions, when the adultery was alleged to have taken place at Kandy, none of these matrimonial offences was said to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Ceylon. The loci assigned for these acts on the two other occasions were, on the first, the steamship Ghoorka during a voyage from England to Colombo; and, on the second, the steamship Ravenna, during a voyage from Colombo to Marseilles, an hotel at Marseilles, and in Paris. In her defence, the respondent pleaded that the District Court had not jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Upon the merits, she denied all three charges of adultery, and, with respect to the first charge, pleaded alternatively that it had been condoned by the appellant. Two of the other defendants, who were alleged to have been participant in her adulterous acts on the first and third occasions, also lodged defences, denying the charges made against them, and pleaded that they were not subject to the jurisdiction of the court. The defendant in the first charge also set up the plea of condonation.

The appellant is an Englishman by birth; and at the time when this action was instituted, although officially resident within the district of Matara, he admittedly retained, and still continues to retain, his English domicile of origin. He had previously brought a divorce suit, founded on the same charges of adultery, and directed against the same parties, before the Divorce Court in England, and these proceedings appear to be still in dependence. At the time when they were cited to appear in the District Court of Matara, not one of the three persons who are co-defendants with the respondent was resident in, or was alleged by the appellant to have any connection with, the island. They are described in his plaint, as "of Calcutta, India," and "of London, England."

The district judge ruled that jurisdiction to proceed in the suit was conferred upon him by s. 597 of the Civil Procedure Code, No. 2, of 1889, an enactment which their Lordships will have occasion to notice more fully. The case accordingly went to trial before him; and, on considering the evidence, he found that the first charge of adultery had been proved, but that it had been condoned by the appellant, and that the second and third charges had also been established. In respect of the latter findings, he granted a decree nisi, to become absolute in four months unless good cause were shown against it. On appeal to the Supreme Court, that order was reversed, and the appellant's suit dismissed with costs. Acting Chief Justice LAWRIE, and Acting Puisne Justice BROWN, who constituted the Court of Appeal, based their judgment upon two independent grounds. They held, in the first place, that the courts of Ceylon had no jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage between British or European spouses resident in the island. Such jurisdiction appeared to them to be expressly excluded by s. 53 of the Royal Charter of April 18, 1801, which enacted that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the island—at that time the only court competent to try matrimonial causes—should be exercised

"towards and upon all the Dutch inhabitants of the said town, fort, and district, according to the laws and usages in that behalf in force at the time the said settlements, territories, and dependencies came into our possession; and, towards and upon the said British and Europeans, and licensed persons hereinbefore described, resident in any of the said settlements, territories, and dependencies, according to the ecclesiastical law, as the same is now used and exercised in the diocese of London, in Great Britain."

That enactment applied to British residents in Ceylon the matrimonial law of England, as it existed in the year 1801; and if it had stood unaltered, the conclusion of the learned judges would have been irresistible. They held, in the second place, that the second and third charges of adultery, which were subsequent to condonation, had not been established by the evidence.

Their Lordships, in deciding this appeal, must observe the limits which the law of Ceylon imposes upon the matrimonial jurisdiction exercisable by the tribunal before which the action was originally brought. It, therefore, becomes necessary to consider whether the District Court of Matara was competent to entertain the action and to pronounce a decree of divorce a vinculo. To that point, which is one of some importance to British and other European residents in the island, the arguments of counsel on both sides of the Bar were exclusively directed. Jurisdiction in matrimonial causes, which, by the Royal Charter of 1801, was vested in the Supreme Court of Judicature, has by subsequent legislation been extended to the district courts of the island. The last of a series of enactments to the same effect is to be found in s. 597 of the Procedure Code of 1889, which provides that "any husband or wife may present a plaint to the district court within the limits of which he or she, as the case may be, resides, praying that his or her marriage may, by the law applicable in this colony to his or her case, be dissolved."

This enactment, like those which preceded it, refers to procedure only, and distributes the matrimonial jurisdiction which may be competently exercised by its tribunals among the various courts of the colony. The judge of the district court assumed that it gave him jurisdiction to try the present case, but it is clear that

A neither s. 597 of the Code, nor previous enactments to a similar effect, empowered him to entertain any divorce suit which was not previously cognisable by the courts of Ceylon. If s. 53 of the charter of 1801, upon which the learned judges of the Supreme Court relied, had continued in force, it would have been beyond the competency of the District Court of Matara to give the appellant a more stringent remedy than separation a mensa et thoro. But it does not appear to have been brought under the notice of the appellate judges that the whole clauses of the charter of 1801, including s. 53, were revoked and annulled by the Ceylon Charter of Justice, of Feb. 18, 1833. Since that date there has been no legislation regulating the jurisdiction of the courts of Ceylon in matrimonial causes arising between British or European spouses.

C In these circumstances, it becomes necessary to consider, in the first place, what is the present law of the island by which such jurisdiction is regulated; and, in the second place, whether according to that law, the present suit is maintainable. The first of these questions appears to their Lordships to admit only of one answer. After the annexation of the Dutch settlements in the island of Ceylon to the British Crown, a commission was granted on April 19, 1798, to Frederick North, appointing him to be governor and commander-in-chief, and containing instructions to him with respect to the administration of justice and other matters. In pursuance of these instructions, the governor issued a Royal Proclamation, promulgated at Colombo, on Sept. 23, 1799, which declared that the administration of justice and police thenceforth and during His Majesty's pleasure, to be exercised by all courts of judicature, civil and criminal,

E "according to the laws and institutions that subsisted under the ancient government of the United Provinces, subject to such deviations and alterations by any of the respective powers and authorities hereinbefore mentioned, and to such deviations and alterations as we shall by these presents, or by any future proclamation, and in pursuance of the authorities confided to us, deem it proper and beneficial for the purposes of justice to ordain and publish, or which shall or may hereafter be by lawful authority ordained and published."

F The matrimonial law of the colony established by the proclamation of 1799 was superseded, or at least modified, in so far as it related to British and European residents, by the enactments of the Royal Charter of 1801. But it does not appear to their Lordships to admit of doubt, that, as soon as these enactments were swept away by the legislation of 1833, the proclamation was restored to its original force, and the matrimonial law applicable to British or European residents in Ceylon again became the Roman-Dutch law which had prevailed in the colony before its annexation.

G Accordingly the prejudicial question which their Lordships have to decide is, whether the Roman Dutch law, or any modification of it introduced into the colony before the year 1798, gives the courts of the island jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage contracted in England by British subjects, who, though resident within the forum, still retain their English domicile. No authority can have a material bearing upon that point which does not relate to the dissolution of marriage, because there are unquestionably other remedies for matrimonial misconduct, short of dissolution, which, according to the rules of the jus gentium, may be administered by the courts of the country in which spouses domiciled elsewhere are for the time resident. If, for instance, a husband deserts his wife, although their residence be of a temporary character, these courts may compel him to aliment her; and, in cases where the residence is of a more permanent character, and the husband treats his wife with such a degree of cruelty as to render her continuance in his society intolerable, the weight of opinion among international jurists and the general practice is to the effect that the courts of the residence are warranted in giving the remedy of judicial separation, without reference to the domicile of the parties. But the considerations which justify the courts of the residence in administering remedies for the protection of mutual rights incidental to marriage, which do not involve disruption of the marriage bond, have little or no application to proceedings taken for the purpose of putting an end to the marriage, and remanding the spouses to the condition of single persons. A

In order to sustain the competency of the present suit, it is necessary for the appellant to show that the jurisdiction assumed by the district judge of Matara was derived, either from some recognised principle of the general law of nations, or from some domestic rule of the Roman-Dutch law. If either of these points were established, the jurisdiction of the district court would be placed beyond question: but the effect of its decree divorcing the spouses would not in each case be the same. B
When the jurisdiction of the court is exercised according to the rules of international law, as in the case where the parties have their domicile within its forum, its decree dissolving their marriage ought to be respected by the tribunals of every civilised C country. The opinions expressed by the English common law judges in R. v. Lolley (1) gave rise to a doubt whether that principle was in consistency with the law of England, which at that time did not allow a marriage to be judicially dissolved. That doubt has since been dispelled: and the law of England was, in their Lordships' opinion, correctly stated by LORD WESTBURY in Shaw v. Gould (2) in these D terms (L.R. 3 H.L. at p. 85):

"The position that the tribunal of a foreign country having jurisdiction to dissolve the marriages of its own subjects, is competent to pronounce a similar decree between English subjects who were married in England, but who before and at the time of the suit are permanently domiciled within the jurisdiction of such foreign tribunal, such decree being made in a bona fide suit without E collusion or concert, is a position consistent with all the English decisions, although it may not be consistent with the resolution commonly cited as the resolution of the judges in Lolley's Case (1)."

On the other hand, a decree of divorce a vinculo, pronounced by a court whose jurisdiction is solely derived from some rule of municipal law peculiar to its forum, cannot, when it trenches upon the interests of any other country to whose tribunals F the spouses were amenable, claim extra-territorial authority.

Counsel for the appellant, did not assert the existence of any special rule in the Roman-Dutch law giving jurisdiction to entertain a divorce suit in such circumstances as occur in the present case. He maintained that, in addition to jurisdiction arising from the fact of the spouses having their domicile of succession within the territory, which he admitted to be universally acknowledged, the general law of nations recognises that a concurrent and equally effective jurisdiction to divorce is created by the spouses' residence within the territory of such permanence as to constitute what has been termed a "matrimonial domicile," although not of sufficient permanence to fix their true domicile there. In support of the theory of a matrimonial domicile, as distinguished from the domicile of succession, the learned counsel relied G H mainly, if not exclusively, upon certain decisions by the courts of England and Scotland, which he represented as conclusive in his favour.

Their Lordships will at once proceed to examine these authorities, beginning with the English cases, which do not appear to them to be either consistent or satisfactory. The Scottish cases are not, in their Lordships' opinion, more satisfactory than the English; but, so far as they go, they have the merit of consistency. The first in date I of the English cases is Tollemache v. Tollemache (3) which was decided by WILLIAMS, J., MARTIN, B., and the Judge Ordinary. The suit was for divorce at the instance of the husband, who was throughout a domiciled Englishman. The parties were first married at Gretna Green, and thereafter entered into a regular marriage in London in August, 1837. From that date, with the exception of occasional visits to England and Wales, they resided continuously in Scotland; and, on July 3, 1841, the husband obtained a decree of divorce from the Scottish courts for the adultery of the wife committed in Scotland. In her answer to the English suit, which was

A instituted eighteen years afterwards, the wife also prayed the court for a decree, declaring her marriage with the petitioner to be dissolved. The court granted decree of dissolution, with the observation (1 Sw. & Tr. at p. 561):

B "Sitting here as an English Matrimonial court, we cannot recognise [the Scottish] divorce as putting an end to the marriage bond of a domiciled Englishman."

C The next case in order, Yelverton v. Yelverton (4), was a suit at an alleged wife's instance for restitution of conjugal rights, which was dismissed by the judge ordinary. The husband who was called as respondent was not resident and had never been domiciled in England. Their Lordships have noticed these cases because they were founded upon in the argument addressed to them. They need hardly observe that in neither of them was any question raised in regard to matrimonial domicile. In Tollemache v. Tollemache (3) it might very well have been contended that four years' residence there had given the spouses a matrimonial domicile in Scotland; but that view of the law does not seem to have occurred either to the parties or to the Bench.

D In the next case, Brodie v. Brodie (5), the petitioner, being the husband, was resident, but had not his domicile, in England. He had been married to the respondent in Tasmania, and left her behind him in Melbourne, when he came to Great Britain. His wife never came to England, and the acts of adultery charged in his petition were committed in the colony. In giving decree, the court, consisting of the judge ordinary, with WIGHTMAN and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.J., observed (2 Sw. & Tr. at p. 263):

E "We think that the petitioner was bona fide resident here, not casually, or as a traveller; after he became resident here, his wife was carrying on an adulterous intercourse in Australia. He is, therefore, entitled to a decree nisi for a dissolution of his marriage."

F These observations go the whole length of affirming that the residence of the husband in a country where he has not a domicile, if such residence be not casual, or that of a traveller, gives the courts of that country divorce jurisdiction over him, and also over his wife, although she should continue to reside in the country where they both have their domicile of succession. In Manning v. Manning (6) the judge ordinary dismissed a petition for divorce at the instance of an Irish husband, upon the ground that he was not a bona fide resident in England.

G The next authority adduced for the appellant was Wilson v. Wilson (7), which their Lordships notice because of its connection with a Scottish case between the same parties to which they will have occasion to refer. At the time of their marriage in 1861, both the spouses had their domicile of origin in Scotland, and they continued to reside there until November, 1866, when the husband discovered that the lady had been guilty of adultery. He then went to England, and lived there with his mother until April, 1871, when he presented his petition to the judge ordinary. During its dependence, he brought an action in the Court of Session, and obtained a decree of divorce, after it had been found that he was still domiciled in Scotland. LORD PENZANCE, upon the evidence before him, held that the petitioner had, in April, 1871, acquired an English domicile, and he accordingly pronounced a similar decree, upon the ground that the Scottish courts had no jurisdiction. No question as to what is called matrimonial as distinguished from true domicile was raised in the case. The petitioner was admittedly resident in England, and was found to have his domicile there; but LORD PENZANCE, in delivering judgment, expressed his opinion to the effect that actual domicile afforded the only true test of jurisdiction in such cases.

I The last, and not the least important of the English authorities requiring to be considered is Niboyet v. Niboyet (8). Shortly stated, the facts were these. A Frenchman and an Englishwoman were married at Gibraltar, in the year 1856. In 1875 the husband went to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and continued to reside there until October, 1876, when his wife filed a petition in the Divorce Division of the High Court of Justice, alleging adultery coupled with desertion for two years and upwards. A

 It was admitted that the respondent, being in the consular service of France, had never lost his domicile of origin. The judge ordinary (SIR R. PHILLIMORE) held that he had no jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. On appeal, his judgment was reversed by JAMES and COTTON, L.JJ., the present Master of the Rolls (then BRETT, L.J.), dissenting. The main reason assigned for their decision by the learned judges of the majority was, that, before the Act of 1857 became law, the petitioner would B have been entitled to sue her husband in the Bishop's Court, although he was not domiciled in England, and to ask either for restitution of conjugal rights, or for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and in either case for proper alimony; and, consequently, that, after the Act of 1857 was passed, jurisdiction in divorce might be exercised in the same circumstances. There appears to their Lordships to be an obvious fallacy C in that reasoning. It is not doubtful that there may be residence without domicile sufficient to sustain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, for separation, or for aliment; but it does not follow that such residence must also give jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. Their Lordships cannot construe s. 27 of the Act of 1857 as giving the English court divorce jurisdiction in all cases where any other matrimonial suit would previously have been entertained in the Bishop's Court.

The only Scottish authority cited by counsel for the appellant was Pitt v. Pitt (9). D
 But, in order to ascertain whether, and if so to what extent, the doctrine of matrimonial domicile is regarded in Scotland as a good foundation for the exercise of divorce jurisdiction, their Lordships find it necessary to refer to the other cases in which the doctrine has been applied or discussed by a Scottish court. Although the matrimonial courts of Scotland had previously exhibited no lack of ingenuity in E discovering grounds for exercising divorce jurisdiction in cases where the parties had their domicile elsewhere, it was not until the year 1862 that the idea of a matrimonial domicile, other than true domicile, and resting upon a somewhat indefinite permanency of residence, which had been foreshadowed in Shields v. Shields (10), was first formulated and applied in Jack v. Jack (11).

In that case both spouses were Scottish, and after their marriage they continued to live together in Scotland until the year 1855, when the husband went to America, F and became a minister of the Gospel at Newburgh, in the State of New York, the wife continuing to reside in Scotland. Four and a half years afterwards, the husband, who was still in America, brought his action founded on adultery committed by his wife in Scotland. It was met by the plea of no jurisdiction, and was heard before twelve judges of the Court of Session, who upheld the jurisdiction of G the court by a majority of eleven to one. The late Lord President INGLIS (at that time Lord Justice Clerk), went upon the ground of matrimonial domicile, which he thus defined :

“The true inquiry, I apprehend, in every such case is, where is the home or seat of the marriage for the time; where are the spouses actually resident if they be together; or if from any cause they are separate, what is the place in H which they are under obligation to come, and renew, or commence, their cohabitation as man and wife?”

Five other judges took substantially the same view expressed in different languages. Lord President M'NEILL, with two of their Lordships, concurred in the judgment, holding that the domicile of the married pair had never been transferred to any other I country. LORD KINLOCH and LORD JERVISWOODE, intimated their opinion that the true domicile of the husband was the only test of jurisdiction, but held that the husband was not shown to have lost his Scottish domicile. LORD DEAS held that there was no jurisdiction, because the pursuer had acquired a new domicile in the United States. With regard to the matrimonial domicile which found favour with some members of the Court, his Lordship observed :

“Neither can I solve this case by what has been sometimes called the domicile of the marriage. The phraseology appears to me to be calculated to mislead.

A It is figurative, and wants judicial precision. There is no third domicile involved apart from the domicile of the husband and the domicile of the wife. Domicil belongs exclusively to persons. Having ascertained the domicile of the husband and the domicile of the wife, the inquiry into domicile is exhausted."

B The doctrine of matrimonial domicile, as explained by the Lord Justice Clerk in Jack v. Jack (11) was subsequently applied by his Lordship and other judges of the Second Division, in Hume v. Hume (12), where they granted a decree of divorce for adultery to a wife whose husband had been in America for seventeen years, and was living with a woman whom he had married there.

C The next case, which is also the last case in which the so-called matrimonial domicile has been made the ground of divorce jurisdiction in Scotland, is Pitt v. Pitt (9) already mentioned. In that case, Colonel Pitt, a domiciled Englishman and married there, went to Scotland, chiefly for the purpose of avoiding his creditors, leaving his wife in London. With the exception of occasional visits, in disguise, to relatives in England, he continued to reside in the Hebrides for six years, and then brought an action for divorce on the ground of adultery. His wife, who had never been in Scotland, appeared to defend, and pleaded that, her husband being domiciled D in England, the Court of Session had no jurisdiction. After proof, the Lord Ordinary (LORD KINLOCH) found that the pursuer had acquired a domicile in Scotland, and gave him decree of divorce. His decision was affirmed by the Second Division of the court, who, differing from him on that point, came to the conclusion that the pursuer still retained his English domicile, but held that his residence in Scotland had been of such a character as to make that country the domicile of the marriage. E On appeal to the House of Lords, these judgments were reversed, and the defender assolizied from the conclusions of the action. At the Bar of the House the pursuer's counsel (SIR R. PHILLIMORE, then Queen's Advocate, and SIR HUGH CAIRNS) intimated that

F "they had come to the resolution of abandoning as untenable the ground on which the Second Division of the Court of Session had rested their decision, namely, that divorce a vinculo might be validly granted to strangers not domiciled, though temporarily resident, within the jurisdiction."

G They, accordingly, confined their argument in support of the judgments appealed from to an endeavour to show that Colonel Pitt had acquired a Scottish domicile. The Lord Chancellor (LORD WESTBURY), in delivering judgment, referred to the course taken by counsel in these terms (10 L.T. at pp. 627, 628):

H "If he was not domiciled in Scotland to all intents and purposes, having relinquished his original domicile and acquired a domicile in Scotland, then by the concession of the counsel at the Bar, a concession which is, I trust, in the opinion of your Lordships, quite in accordance with the law of the case, it will be impossible to maintain the order which has been pronounced in the court below."

Neither LORD CHELMSEFORD nor LORD KINGSDowns, who sat with the Lord Chancellor, took any exception to that statement.

I After the observations made by LORD WESTBURY in Pitt v. Pitt (9), from which the other noble and learned Lords present did not express dissent, it would be very rash to affirm that, according to the law of Scotland, mere matrimonial domicile affords any ground for jurisdiction to divorce. There is no trace of the doctrine to be found in the Institutes of Scottish Law, or in the earlier decisions of the court; and, during the thirty-one years which have elapsed since Pitt v. Pitt (9) was decided by the House of Lords, the divorce jurisdiction of the Court of Session has never been exercised on that ground. It has, however, been twice referred to since that date, first in the year 1872, in Wilson v. Wilson (13), and again, ten years afterwards, in Stavert v. Stavert (14).

In Wilson v. Wilson (13) the parties were the same as in the English case already noticed. On his finding that his English suit was met by the plea that he retained his Scottish domicile, the husband brought an action of divorce in the Court of Session, and was there met by the plea that he had acquired an English domicile. The Lord Ordinary, whose judgment was affirmed by the First Division, found that he was domiciled in Scotland, and, notwithstanding the dependence of the English suit, granted decree of divorce. In the note appended to his judgment, the Lord Ordinary (LORD ORMIDALE) observed that “having regard to the judgment in the House of Lords in Pitt v. Pitt (9) in April, 1864, any such thing as a consistorial or matrimonial domicile must be held to be unknown to the law.”

In delivering the judgment of the Inner House, Lord President INGLIS said :

“In cases of divorce, jurisdiction depends upon domicile, and the domicile in this case is here. And if the domicile, and consequently the jurisdiction, is here, they can be nowhere else. I have always been of opinion, as I expressed myself in the case of Pitt v. Pitt (9), and I have never seen any reason to change that opinion, that for the purposes of divorce there may be a matrimonial domicile, differing from the absolute domicile which will rule succession.”

Their Lordships find it difficult to reconcile these statements. If there really were such a thing as a matrimonial domicile recognised by general law, it is not easy to comprehend why the jurisdiction could be nowhere else than in Scotland. On that assumption, the pursuer had certainly acquired a matrimonial domicile in England by five years' continuous residence there; and, in deference to international rules, the Scottish court ought not to have entertained the same lis which was already pending in the proper court of the matrimonial domicile.

In Stavert v. Stavert (14) the Lord Ordinary refused to grant a divorce to a foreigner who had come to Scotland with his paramour, and had lived there for five months, with the sole object of obtaining a divorce from his wife. The pursuer maintained, alternatively, that he had acquired either a real domicile or a matrimonial domicile in Scotland. The Lord President (LORD INGLIS) held that he was possessed of neither; and with reference to matrimonial domicile his Lordship said :

“There has been a good deal of speculation on this point, but fortunately it is not necessary to deal with the question here. It has not yet been decided in the court of last resort.”

LORD DEAS reiterated the views which he had expressed in Pitt v. Pitt (9), and LORD SHAND, dealing with the same subject, said :

“I have great difficulty in finding any sound principle of general application which would induce foreign courts to give weight to a decree in this country based on such jurisdiction; and I have, further, great difficulty in finding any rule or standard as to the nature and extent of the residence which would be necessary or sufficient to found such a jurisdiction.”

When carefully examined, neither the English nor the Scottish decisions are, in their Lordships' opinion, sufficient to establish the proposition that, in either of these countries, there exists a recognised rule of general law, to the effect that a so-called matrimonial domicile gives jurisdiction to dissolve marriage. Tollemache v. Tollemache (3), which was decided by three judges in 1859, shortly after the passing of the Divorce Act, appears to be an authority to the contrary. The learned judges sustained the jurisdiction of the English court, which was the forum of the husband's domicile, and disregarded as incompetent a decree of the Court of Session dissolving his marriage, although he had a matrimonial domicile in Scotland, where he had bona fide resided for four years with his wife, neither casually, nor as a traveller. Then in Brodie v. Brodie (5), in the year 1861, three learned judges decided the opposite, holding that residence of that kind, which had been found in Tollemache v. Tollemache (3), to be insufficient to give jurisdiction to a Scottish Court where the

A domicile was English, was nevertheless sufficient to give jurisdiction to themselves where the domicile was Australian. In Wilson v. Wilson (7) jurisdiction was sustained by LORD PENZANCE upon the ground that the petitioner had acquired an English domicile, with an expression of opinion by his Lordship, that such domicile ought to be the sole ground of jurisdiction to dissolve marriage. In Niboyet v. Niboyet (8) SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE expressed a similar opinion, and dismissed the suit of the petitioner, who had a matrimonial domicile in England, which fully answered the definition of such domicile given either in Brodie v. Brodie (5) or in Pitt v. Pitt (9). His decision was, no doubt, reversed in the Court of Appeal; but it had the support of the present Master of the Rolls, and their Lordships have already pointed out that the judgment of the majority was mainly, if not altogether, based upon a reason which will not bear scrutiny.

C The Scottish decisions appear to their Lordships to be equally inefficient to show that a matrimonial domicile is a recognised ground of divorce jurisdiction. So far as they go, they are consistent enough, but the doctrine appears to have had a very brief existence, because the three cases in which it was applied all occurred between Feb. 7 and Dec. 14 in the year 1862. Although, owing to the course taken by the appellant's counsel in Pitt v. Pitt (9) the House of Lords had not an opportunity of expressly deciding the point, there can be little doubt that the approval of the course adopted by counsel, which was openly expressed by LORD WESTBURY, has had the effect of discrediting the doctrine in Scotland, and it is impossible to affirm that the Court of Session would now give effect to it. The eminent judge, who, in 1862, was the first to give a full and clear exposition of the doctrine of matrimonial domicile, spoke of it, in the year 1882, not as a doctrine accepted in the law of Scotland, but as matter of speculation. It is a circumstance not undeserving of notice that the learned judges, whether English or Scottish, who have expressed judicial opinions in favour of a matrimonial domicile, have abstained from reference to those treatises on international law which are generally regarded as authoritative, in the absence of any municipal law to the contrary. The reason for their abstinence is probably to be found in the circumstance that nothing could be extracted from these sources favourable to the view which they took.

F Their Lordships are of opinion that in deciding the present case, on appeal from a colony which is governed by the principles of the Roman-Dutch law, these authorities ought not to be overlooked. HUBER (lib. 1, tit. 3, s. 2, DE CONF. LEG.) states the rule of international law in these terms:

G “Rectores imperiorum id comiter agunt, ut jura ejusque populi intra terminos ejus exercita, teneant ubique suam vim, quatenus nihil potestati aut jura alterius imperantis ejusque civium præjudicetur.”

That passage was cited with approbation by LORD CRANWORTH, and LORD WESTBURY, in Shaw v. Gould (2) (L.R. 3 H.L. at pp. 72 and 81). To the same effect, but in language more pointed, is the text of RODENBURG (DE STAT. DIVERS. tit. 1, c. 3, s. 4) cited in the same case by LORD WESTBURY:

ersum in illa jus sit attributum.”

I The same rule is laid down by BAR, the latest continental writer on the theory and practice of international private law. He says (s. 173 GILLESPIE'S TRANSLATION, p. 382)

“that in actions of divorce—unless there is some express enactment to the contrary—the judge of the domicile or nationality is the only competent judge. . . . A decree of divorce, therefore, pronounced by any other judge than a judge of the domicile or nationality, is to be regarded in all other countries as inoperative.”

There can, in their Lordships' opinion, be no satisfactory canon of international law, regulating jurisdiction in divorce cases, which is not capable of being enunciated with sufficient precision to ensure practical uniformity in its application. But any judicial definition of matrimonial domicile which has hitherto been attempted has been singularly wanting in precision, and not in the least calculated to produce a uniform result. The definitions given in Brodie v. Brodie (5) and in Pitt v. Pitt (9), appear to their Lordships to be equally open to that objection. Bona fide residence is an intelligible expression, if, as their Lordships conceive, it means residence which has not been resorted to for the mere purpose of getting a divorce which was not obtainable in the country of domicile. Residence which is "not that of a traveller" is not very definite; but nothing can be more vague than the description of residence which, not being that of a traveller, is not to be regarded as "casual." So also, the place where it is the duty of the wife to rejoin her husband, if they happen to be living in different countries, is very indefinite. It may be her conjugal duty to return to his society although he is living as a traveller, or casually, in a country where he has no domicile. Neither the English nor the Scottish definitions, which are to be found in the decisions already referred to, give the least indication of the degree of permanence, if any, which is required in order to constitute matrimonial domicile, or afford any test by which that degree of permanence is to be ascertained. The introduction of so loose a rule into the jus gentium would, in all probability, lead to an inconvenient variety of practice, and would occasion the very conflict which it is the object of international jurisprudence to prevent. Their Lordships attach great weight to the consideration that the theory of matrimonial domicile for which the appellant contends has never been accepted in the court of last resort for England and Scotland.

The matter does not rest there, because the theory is not only in direct opposition to the clear opinion expressed by LORD WESTBURY in Pitt v. Pitt (9), but appears to their Lordships to be at variance with the principles recognised by noble and learned lords, in Dolphin v. Robins (15), and in Shaw v. Gould (2). It is true that in these cases, and especially in Dolphin v. Robins (15), there was ground for holding that the spouses had resorted to a foreign country and a foreign tribunal in order to escape from the law and the courts of their English domicile. But in both, the international principle, upon which jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage depends, was considered and discussed; and the arguments addressed to their Lordships in favour of matrimonial domicile appear to them to run counter to the whole tenor of the observations which were made by noble and learned Lords in these cases.

In Dolphin v. Robins (15), LORD CRANWORTH stated (7 H.L.Cas. at p. 414) that

"it must be taken now as clearly established that the Scotch court has no power to dissolve an English marriage, where, as in this case, the parties are not really domiciled in Scotland, but have only gone there for such a time as, according to the doctrine of the Scotch courts, gives them jurisdiction in the matter."

In Shaw v. Gould (2), the dicta of noble and learned lords upon the point raised in this appeal was even more emphatic. LORDS CRANWORTH and WESTBURY expressed their entire approval of the doctrine laid down by HUBER and RODENBURG in those passages which have already been cited. Their Lordships did not go the length of saying that the courts of no other country could divorce spouses who were domiciled in England; but they held that the courts of England were not bound, by any principle of international law, to recognise as effectual the decree of a foreign court divorcing spouses, who, at its date, had their domicile in England. The other noble and learned Lords who took part in the decision of Shaw v. Gould (2) were LORDS CHELMSFORD and COLONSAY. LORD CHELMSFORD did not express any opinion upon the subject of matrimonial domicile. LORD COLONSAY rested his judgment upon the fact that the spouses had resorted to Scotland for the very purpose of committing a fraud upon the law of their English domicile; but he indicated an opinion that, in the absence of such fraudulent purpose, they might have obtained a valid

A divorce in Scotland, after a residence in that country which was insufficient to change their domicile of succession.

Their Lordships have in these circumstances, and upon these considerations, come to the conclusion that, according to international law, the domicile for the time being of the married pair affords the only true test of jurisdiction to dissolve their marriage. They concur, without reservation, in the views expressed by LORD PENZANCE in Wilson v. Wilson (7), which were obviously meant to refer, not to questions arising in regard to the mutual rights of married persons, but to jurisdiction in the matter of divorce (see L.R. 2 P. & D. at p. 442):

C "It is the strong inclination of my own opinion that the only fair and satisfactory rule to adopt on this matter of jurisdiction is to insist upon the parties in all cases referring their matrimonial differences to the courts of the country in which they are domiciled. Different communities have different views and laws respecting matrimonial obligations, and a different estimate of the causes which should justify divorce. It is both just and reasonable, therefore, that the differences of married people should be adjusted in accordance with the laws of the community to which they belong, and dealt with by the tribunals which alone can administer those laws. An honest adherence to this principle, moreover, will preclude the scandal which arises when a man and woman are held to be a man and wife in one country, and strangers in another."

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the order appealed from. The appellant must pay to the first and fourth respondents their costs of this appeal.

G COUNTY OF GLOUCESTER BANK v. RUDRY MERTHYR STEAM AND HOUSE COAL COLLIERY CO. AND OTHERS

H [Reported [1895] 1 Ch. 629; 64 L.J.Ch. 451; 72 L.T. 375; 43 W.R. 486; 39 Sol. Jo. 331; 2 Mans. 223; 12 R. 183]

Company—Management—Presumption that directors have acted regularly—Deed signed by two directors—Power in articles to directors to prescribe quorum—Resolution prescribing quorum of three directors—Validity of deed.

I Where there is nothing in the public documents of a company to put on enquiry a person who is dealing with the company that person is entitled to accept as regular a document on the face of which there does not appear anything irregular, e.g., a mortgage deed signed by two directors of the company, whereas the directors, exercising a power given to them by the articles of association, had in fact, as a matter of internal management, passed a resolution constituting three directors a quorum to perform such an act.

Rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1) (1856), 6 E. & B. 327, applied.

D'Arcy v. Tamar, Kit Hill, and Callington Rail. Co. (2) (1867), L.R. 2 Exch. 158, distinguished.

Mortgage—Business—Colliery—Receiver and manager—Appointment after mortgagors had entered into possession.

Leases of colliery property which had been granted to the mortgagors were sub-demised by them to the mortgagees as security for a loan. The mortgagors became insolvent, the mortgagees appointed a receiver of rents and profits under s. 19 (1) (iii) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 [now the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 101 (1) (iii)] and then, finding it necessary that they should be empowered to work the mines, applied to the court for an order for the appointment of a receiver and manager.

Held: a “colliery” meant a business and the sub-demise of the leases included and implied in its terms the business of getting and selling coal which was carried on by the company; it was essential for the preservation of their security that the mortgagees should be at liberty to carry on the business; and the order which they sought would be made although they had already entered into possession.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of NORTH, J., on a motion by mortgagees for an order appointing a receiver and manager.

By two indentures of lease, dated respectively April 14, 1877, and June 1, 1878, and made between the lessors and lessees therein respectively named, certain mines, beds, veins, and seams of coal, iron ore, ironstone, and fireclay, situate

A in the parish of Rudry, in the county of Glamorgan, were demised to the lessees for the respective terms of thirty-nine years from Feb. 2, 1876, and forty years from Feb. 2, 1875, at and subject to the several rents and royalties and covenants on the part of the lessees and conditions thereby and therein reserved and contained. By an indenture of lease, dated Sept. 27, 1883, and made between the lessor and lessees therein named, a railway or tramway wayleave and right of way and certain hereditaments, all situate in the parish of Rudry, were demised to the lessees for the term of thirty-two years from Feb. 2, 1883, at and subject to the several rents and royalties and covenants on the part of the lessees and conditions thereby and therein reserved and contained. By an indenture of lease, dated Dec. 26, 1883, and made between the lessor and lessees therein named, a certain level situate and being in and under a certain farm and lands in the parish of Rudry (except as therein mentioned) was demised to the lessees for the term of thirty-two years from Feb. 2, 1883, at and subject to the several rents and royalties and covenants on the part of the lessees and conditions thereby and therein reserved and contained. By an indenture, dated Sept. 1, 1888, and made between the lessees under the several before-mentioned indentures of lease, of the one part, and the defendant company, of the other part, all the premises comprised in and demised by those indentures of lease were assigned to the defendant company for all the residue then unexpired of the several terms for which the same were granted as aforesaid, subject to the several rents and royalties and other moneys reserved by the indentures and the covenants, conditions, and declarations in the same indentures respectively contained.

E By an indenture dated Mar. 14, 1893, and made between the defendant company, of the one part, and the above-named plaintiffs, of the other part, all and singular the several pieces and parcels of land, mines, beds, veins, and seams of coal and other the premises comprised in and demised by the several before-mentioned indentures of lease, and also all buildings and erections, fixed motive powers, and fixed powers of machinery erected and being on the premises (excepting such machinery as would be deemed personal chattels within the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882), were demised to the plaintiffs for all the residue of the several terms of thirty-nine years, forty years, thirty-two years, and thirty-two years, granted respectively by the indentures of lease, except the last three days of each of the terms, by way of mortgage to secure payment of the sum of £6,000 and interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum at the times and in manner therein mentioned. On Nov. 21, 1894, an order was made for the winding-up of the defendant company. Some time prior to the making of that order the defendant company had ceased to carry on its business or to work the colliery and other property comprised in the before-mentioned indentures of lease. Large sums were claimed by the lessors to be due for arrears of rent and royalties, and the defendant company was hopelessly insolvent. The defendant company had granted a second mortgage of the property comprised in the several before-mentioned indentures of lease, and had executed a bill of sale of their chattels and effects, in favour of the defendants Joseph Heald and Samuel Gething Lewis, trading as the Bute Works Supply Co. There was also a third mortgage in favour of the defendant Edwin Starbuck Williams.

I On Dec. 27, 1894, the plaintiffs, by virtue of the power conferred on them by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, appointed a receiver of the rents, profits, and income of all the property comprised in or subject to the indenture of mortgage of Mar. 14, 1893, with all the powers conferred on a receiver by that Act, and to the intent that he should apply all moneys received by him in manner directed by s. 24 (8) of that Act [Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 109 (8)]. It being considered that it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for the plaintiffs to sell the mortgaged property unless they were empowered to keep open the colliery and to work the same so that the same might be sold and disposed of as a going concern, and being also apprehensive that the lessors would forfeit the leases on account of the breaches of covenant to work the mines, the plaintiffs brought the present action for foreclosure, and then moved before NORTH, J., for an order appointing a receiver and manager. On Feb. 1, 1895, the motion came on to be heard before NORTH, J., who refused to make any order on it. The plaintiffs appealed. Upon the hearing of the appeal the question was raised, which had not been argued before NORTH, J., whether the mortgage to the plaintiffs was validly executed by the defendant company. It appeared that the articles of association of the defendant company empowered its directors to determine how many of their number should form a quorum at meetings of the board, and a resolution was passed that three directors were required to form a quorum. At meetings which authorised the execution of the mortgage of the company's property in favour of the plaintiffs there were only two directors present, and they sanctioned the mortgage and empowered the secretary to affix the seal of the company to it.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C. (with him A. à Beckett Terrell) for the plaintiffs, the mortgagors.

LORD HALSBURY.—Upon the point whether the mortgage in question was a valid mortgage or not, I am of opinion that nothing has been urged before us which would induce us to say that the authority of the company was not given to the making of this mortgage. When a company is dealing with an outside person who has no other means of knowledge, he is entitled to regard the company as having performed its functions in the transaction by whatever means it can lawfully do so. D'Arcy v. Tamar, Kit Hill, and Callington Rail. Co. (2) was a case in which a bond given by a company was held not to be the bond of the company among other reasons, because by a section of a special Act, the business of the company was to be conducted by a particular quorum of directors, and it was held that all persons dealing with the company were bound, therefore, to know what was in the provisions of the special Act in respect to that matter. If that case were identical in its facts with the case now before us, one would be bound by that decision, but I think the facts are not the same at all. Looking at the decisions in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1) and in the case in the House of Lords of Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (3), they affirm a proposition of a very different character. Persons dealing with joint-stock companies are bound to look at what one may call the outside position of the company; that is to say, they must see that the acts which the company is purporting to do are acts within the general authority of the company. If those public documents, which everyone has a right to refer to, disclose an infirmity in the action of the company persons take the consequences of dealing with a joint-stock company which has apparently exceeded its authority. But the case here is exactly the other way. All the public documents with which an outside person would be acquainted in dealing with the company would only show that by some regulations of their own—what LORD HATHERLEY, in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (3), described as their “indoor management”—they were capable if they had thought right of making any quorum they pleased. An outside person knowing that, and not knowing the internal regulations, when he found a document, sealed with the common seal of the company, and attested and signed by two of the directors and the secretary, was, I think, entitled to assume that that was the mode by which authority was conferred on the company to make an instrument of that description. It turns out that by their internal regulations the number of directors should have exceeded two, and that there ought to have been three. But then that is a matter which, as LORD HATHERLEY says in Mahony's Case (3), was known to them and them alone. The only external management of the company of which an outside person would be cognisant would be that they had power to make any quorum they pleased. Having these documents before us, I think we should be entitled to assume that the proper quorum had been properly summoned and attended to effect the completion of the instrument.

That disposes of the first point as to the validity of the mortgage. As to the second, which I may call the substantial part of this case, it altogether depends upon what is involved in a mortgage of colliery leases. Subject to a question which I will deal with in a moment, whether the plaintiffs have put themselves in a worse position by taking possession under their mortgage, it does not appear to be denied that, if the business is sought to be conveyed by the mortgage, and intended by the parties to be conveyed, this application for a receiver and manager is a proper and usual application, and one which would as a matter of course be granted. The management of the colliery business is one which essentially required the appointment of a manager, and it would be proper and usual to come to the court to aid the persons who were invoking its assistance for the purpose of carrying on the business.

There are two objections made. It is said first, that the business is not intended to be conveyed, that this is only a mortgage of a certain quantity of land and seams of coal. That appears to me to rest entirely on a false foundation. It may be that the words of the mortgage do not contain "the colliery and the colliery business," and I assume that they do not. But it is impossible to disregard the nature of the thing itself. What is a colliery? What are the seams of coal, what is the motive power—what does all that phraseology mean but that industrial occupation which we compendiously call a "colliery"? What is the meaning of the transfer of these rights of taking away the coal and of working the coal which are involved in the leases? More than that, there is the right of the lessors to terminate all interest in these things if the coal is not properly, continuously, and uninterruptedly worked, and worked according to the best manner of working in the district in which the mining goes on. It appears to me that, when one looks at the nature of the thing itself, it is impossible to doubt that it was intended by the instruments and by the parties executing them, that what we, as I say, compendiously call "the colliery" was to be transferred, and with it the right of managing the business. If I am right in my construction of what the transfer of a colliery means, then this case is covered distinctly by authority which counsel for the second mortgagees does not seem to contest, viz., Campbell v. Lloyd's, Barnett's and Bosanquet's Bank, Ltd. (4). That therefore, to my mind, disposes of that question, for I am very clearly of opinion that a colliery means a business, and the conveying of colliery leases under these circumstances includes and implies in its terms the business which is carried on by a colliery.

There is this further question. It is said that the parties cannot now make this application, because they have put themselves in the wrong by taking possession. It is urged that, if they have got possession themselves and have exercised the power to take possession which a mortgagee has, they are in the difficulty that they cannot apply to the court to appoint a manager, because, if they chose to manage, they could themselves do so. I do not deny the difficulty, and it is possible that they have done what was ill-advised, and that they ought to have made this application before they had themselves taken possession. But that is not an objection at law, it is an objection only as to the discretion of the court, and if we see that they have got into a difficulty by doing that which was ill-advised perhaps, but that it is for the advantage of all the parties that we should appoint a manager and a receiver, there is no case which could stop us from doing it. We should not interfere under ordinary circumstances, if the parties themselves had taken possession. I agree to that. But it appears to me, from what I have already said, that the circumstances of this case are extremely peculiar, and that we ought to cure the mistake that the parties have made, if we can, and put them in a position which will be to the advantage of all the parties and will prevent the subject-matter of this security being forfeited, as it probably would if we were to hold our hands. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal ought to succeed, and that NORTH, J., ought to have made the order that was requested.

LINDLEY, L. J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the question of the validity of the mortgage, I have not the slightest doubt that the mortgage is perfectly good upon the evidence as it stands. Counsel for the second mortgagees has relied upon D'Arcy v. Tamar, Kit Hill, and Callington Rail. Co. (2), which is always referred to when there has been any irregularity in affixing the seal of a company. But that case does not reach the present case by a very long way. The Court of Exchequer there held that, in an action on a bond, and a plea of non est factum, they could not say that a bond executed under the seal of the company was good, because there were two Acts of Parliament. One was a special Act, which rendered it essential that in the case of any bond issued by the company there should be a quorum of directors present at that particular meeting, there was no such quorum and no such meeting, and the court came to the conclusion that, upon the true construction of those Acts, non est factum was a good defence. That case has never been applied, so far as I know, to registered companies where the quorum and so on depend entirely upon the regulations which the directors may choose to make themselves.

The present case is governed, not by D'Arcy v. Tamar, Kit Hill and Callington Rail. Co. (2), but by Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1), followed as it has been by a string of cases too numerous to refer to, the principal one of which is the Irish case in the House of Lords of Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (4). Here the directors may make any quorum they like—it may be two or it may be more. They did apparently appoint three. The document in question is under the seal of the company signed by two directors and countersigned by the secretary. What could anybody think of that? What is there to put him upon inquiry? What is there to give him notice of anything irregular, if there was anything irregular? If a person looked at that deed and at the articles of association of the company, there does not seem to be anything irregular at all. He would be at liberty to infer, and probably anyone in the ordinary course of business would infer, that if the directors had appointed a quorum they would have appointed the two who signed that deed. But supposing that three were wanted, he is not bound to go and look at the directors' minutes. He has no right to look at them except as a matter of bargain. What is in the minutes does not affect him at all. There is nothing irregular on the face of the deed—there is nothing illegal in it. As to a plea of non est factum, that could not be raised for a moment, and I have not the slightest doubt myself that that deed is as good as any other deed that ever was sealed. So much for that point.

As to the other point, that is an important matter. NORTH, J., has declined to appoint a receiver and manager because, he says, the first mortgagees who ask for a receiver and manager are not mortgagees of the business of the colliery. In one sense that is right, they are not mortgagees of the business in so many words. But what is a colliery? What does it mean? The leases on which this colliery was held were sub-demised to the mortgagees, and those leases contained powers to win and get the coal. The leases were of a colliery to be worked; that is to say, the lessees were to dig out the coal and sell it—take so much of the ground away, and get rid of it for money. There were royalties to be paid, and there were clauses for re-entry, as to the ordinary dead rent, and so on. That property was sublet. What does that mean? What are the sub-lessees to do with such property as that? It is familiar to everybody in this court, I suppose, that for years colliery property has not been property of so much land. Ever since the days of LORD ELDON, and probably long before, there was a distinction drawn between colliery property and ordinary landed property. In Jefferys v. Smith (5), which is one of the leading cases on this point, the Lord Chancellor makes this observation about collieries. It was there a question with regard to a receiver. There were some tenants in common of a colliery. One tenant in common wanted a receiver of the colliery appointed, and it was familiar law in those days that, if one tenant in common wanted a receiver of the property in common, he could not get it. He must go and enter, and the law allowed all tenants in common to enter into possession. LORD ELDON said (1 Jac. & W. at p. 302) :

“The question is, whether mines have not been always considered, not altogether, but in some sort, as a species of trade. How it may be in Wales I do not know; but in my country, where there are frequently twenty owners of the same mine, if each is to have a set of miners going down the shaft to work his twentieth part, it would be impossible to continue working the mine. Must not a contract be implied, that it was to be carried on in a practical and feasible way? I believe I have a note of a case before LORD HARDWICKE, which confirms me in the idea that, where there are part owners of a mine, and they cannot by contract agree to appoint a manager, this court will manage it for them.”

That doctrine never applied to tenants in common of ordinary land, and the reason of it is obvious when you come to think of it.

Let us see what in effect is the mortgage of this colliery. It is intended of course as a security: that is the object of the whole transaction. What are the mortgagees to do? Are they to prevent anybody from going into it? Are they to leave the mortgagors alone whether they pay the interest or not, or whether they make default or not? If they go into possession what are they to do with the property? Bear in mind that, if they do nothing, the mine will be swamped with water, and the property will not be to them what it was intended to be, namely, a security for their repayment. It is absolutely essential that a sub-lessee of a going concern like this is to be at liberty to dig and work the coal, and sell it, and reduce what is due to him on his mortgage. That is a necessary part of the transaction. It has been so treated in, I should think, almost every case of this kind which has come before the courts. It was so treated in the case before CHITTY, J., of Campbell v. Lloyd's, Barnett's, and Bosanquet's Bank, Ltd. (4). That case was substantially like this. I may say that it was exactly like this, except that there the sublease included the loose plant and materials, which this sublease does not. That does not alter the substantial character of the transaction, and it would be a mere mockery to a mortgagee of a colliery, whether by assignment or sub-demise, to tell him he is not to touch the minerals. It is ridiculous. It appears to me that this is a matter in which I will not say that there is a goodwill, but in which it is absolutely essential to the mortgagees' security that the mine should be worked. If not, it may be forfeited at any moment.

If the mortgagees had not embarrassed themselves by taking possession, I should have thought that, under s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 [see now the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 45], it would be almost a matter of course to appoint a receiver and manager. I say under that section, because, before that, I rather think the first mortgagee was told to go and enter. That practice has been altered, it may be beneficially, by s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. The mortgagees have entered, and they find themselves in a difficulty. They find that they have made a false move. They have got themselves into a state of embarrassment by entering into possession because the second mortgagees attack, and say: “If you are going to be mortgagees in possession you have no right to work this colliery; you must do it at your own peril; you must lay out a lot of money in keeping the mine going, and then be disallowed it in your accounts.” That is very awkward, and the plaintiffs want to know where they are, to say the least of it. It appears to me that, there being ample jurisdiction to appoint a receiver and manager, we ought not to abstain from doing it simply because the mortgagees have made what now appears to be a false step, and have taken possession. Their mortgagors are being wound-up, and will not have anything to do with the matter, but the third mortgagees support them. The second mortgagees, finding that the first mortgagees, through taking possession, have got into a difficulty, want to keep them there. I do not think that that is fair. I think that the case for a receiver and manager is amply made out, and that the order of NORTH, J., ought to be discharged, and the receiver and manager appointed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first question that appears to me to arise in this case is: What was the security which was given by the defendant company to the plaintiffs? Was it a mere security of bare land, was it a mere security of a seam of coal, or was it a security which the defendants had to dispose of, namely, the value of the leases and the leases themselves, which they held from the lessors?

Apart from the phraseology of this mortgage deed, I cannot have any doubt myself that the intention of the parties was that one should convey to the other by way of security the security which they had to grant, namely, the leases. The leases were subject also to the covenants that unless the seams of coal were worked the lessors might enter into possession. It seems to me that the subject of the security in this case is not the bare seams, but that it is the coal and the rights which the mortgagors had of working those seams under their leases. If they were not granted under this mortgage deed I do not see what security the plaintiffs took. If they did not work the seams it might well be, and probably would be, that the landlords would re-enter for a forfeiture, and the whole of the security would be gone, because the leases would be put an end to by that re-entry. I think that that is the true meaning of a colliery lease. It is entirely unlike Whitley v. Challis (6), by which NORTH, J., thought himself bound. It is a different thing altogether to a mortgage of a house or an hotel. In Whitley v. Challis (6) this court held that the business of the hotel and the goodwill of the hotel was not comprised in the security; that being so, that the mortgagee, by asking for a receiver, could not enlarge the security which he had not got; and they refused to order a receiver or manager to be appointed. For the reasons which have been given by LORD HALSBURY and LINDLEY, L.J., I am of opinion that the subject-matter of the security in this case is the colliery, and the right to work it as contended for by the plaintiffs.

If the matter had rested there, and nothing had taken place except that on Jan. 25, 1895, this originating summons had been taken out by the plaintiffs for foreclosure of their mortgage and sale, I suppose that under s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, it would have been held by any court that it was just and convenient that a receiver and manager should be appointed. But it is said that something did occur between the granting of the mortgage in March, 1893, and January, 1895, namely, that the plaintiffs, in the interval, entered into possession, and that, therefore, they are not entitled to ask for a receiver. For the reasons which have been given by LORD HALSBURY (and LINDLEY, L.J., has pointed out the difficulty which the plaintiffs were in), in my judgment, the mere fact of their having entered into possession as they did does not render it unjust or not convenient in the present circumstances that a receiver and manager should be appointed. Accordingly, I think that the judgment appealed against should be reversed and the appeal allowed.

There is one other point about the mortgage not having been duly executed so as to be binding upon the defendant company. I have nothing to add except to say this, that the cases which were cited, viz., Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1) and Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (3) are conclusive upon the point that this was a duly executed deed. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Peaceable re-entry by landlord—Right of tenant to relief—Need for new lease where relief granted—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict., c. 76), s. 212.

The proviso for re-entry on demised premises on non-payment of rent is regarded in equity as merely a security for the rent, and, therefore, a tenant is entitled to be relieved against forfeiture on payment of the rent and any expenses to which the landlord has been put. This right to relief exists whether the landlord has obtained possession of the premises by peaceable re-entry or in an action for ejectment. Under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, a tenant who has been relieved shall hold the demised premises "according to the lease thereof made, without any new lease."

The right of a tenant to be relieved from forfeiture of a lease for breach of covenant is a chose in action, which, on the bankruptcy of the tenant, vests in the trustee in bankruptcy, who is entitled to assign the right to a purchaser.

Action for possession.

Some time previously to December, 1892, the defendant entered into an agreement with Lewis Etheridge, a builder, for the erection of certain dwelling-houses in Stanley Road, Dagenham, Essex, and for the granting to Etheridge of leases of the houses so to be erected. On Dec. 2, 1892, the defendant granted to Etheridge a lease of No. 5, Stanley Road, for ninety-nine years from Mar. 25, 1892, at a peppercorn rent for the first year, and thereafter at the rent of £5 paid quarterly. When this lease was granted No. 5, Stanley Road was not completed, but the lease was given to him by the defendant for the express purpose of raising money thereon. On Dec. 11, 1892, Etheridge deposited the lease with the plaintiff by way of security for an advance of £200 and interest. In like manner a lease of No. 1, Stanley Road, was granted to Etheridge on Dec. 22, 1892, and was on April 14, 1893, deposited with the plaintiff to secure another sum of £200 and interest. The leases dealt with the houses as completed, and each contained a proviso enabling the lessor to re-enter on any part of the demised premises in the name of the whole

"if and when any part of the rent hereby reserved shall be in arrear for twenty-one days next after the same shall have become due, whether the same shall have been legally demanded or not, or if the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall not truly observe and perform all and singular the covenants and provisions hereinbefore contained, and thereupon, the term hereby granted shall absolutely determine."

On Feb. 6, 1894, Etheridge was adjudicated a bankrupt. At this date the houses Nos. 1 and 5, Stanley Road, were incomplete. They appeared to have had front doors, but neither back doors nor windows. On Feb. 20, 1894, the plaintiff's solicitor saw the defendant's solicitors, and negotiations took place with a view to the plaintiff's title being completed. On Feb. 21, without notice to the plaintiff, a clerk to a land agent, acting under instructions given him by the defendant's solicitors, went to Nos. 1 and 5, Stanley Road, entered each of them by the back door, and affixed to the front door a notice to the effect that possession had been taken on behalf of the defendant. On Feb. 23, 1894, the defendant's solicitors, by letter, gave the plaintiff's solicitor notice that possession had been taken, "in consequence of breaches of covenant." It was further stated that possession was taken on Feb. 21, at which date rent was in arrear under both leases. Thereupon, correspondence took place between the solicitors of the plaintiff and those of the defendant, in which the plaintiff's solicitor stated that his client would either take an assignment of the old leases from the trustee in bankruptcy, and complete the buildings, or else take a new lease. On April 25 the defendant's solicitors wrote, intimating that their client could not grant fresh leases without provision for claims which he had against Etheridge in respect of bricks supplied to him and sand taken by him from the property, amounting to £81 8s. 6d. On May 4 the plaintiff's solicitor wrote, stating that his client declined to pay anything whatever beyond the costs of the new leases; but that, if the new leases were granted, he would at once proceed to complete the property. On May 28, 1894, the defendant's solicitors wrote, stating that the houses were to be sold. On June 28, 1894, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of £9 7s. 6d., the amount of the ground rent in arrear, but the tender was refused. By a deed, dated July 5, 1894, the

A trustee in bankruptcy of Etheridge, in consideration of £5, assigned to the plaintiff all his interest in Nos. 1 and 5, Stanley Road.

B On July 6, 1894, the plaintiff brought this action, claiming possession of the properties comprised in the leases at the rents and under and subject to the lessee's covenants and conditions in such leases respectively reserved and contained, and relief from any forfeiture of the leases on payment of the rents reserved by the leases, or on such terms as the court should think just. Apart from the nonpayment of the rent, it was not at the trial alleged that any breach of covenant had been committed which would justify the re-entry; and the question was whether, under these circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to be relieved from the forfeiture.

By s. 212 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 :

C "If the tenant or his assignee do or shall, at any time before the trial in such ejectment, pay or tender to the lessor or landlord . . . or pay into court where the same cause is depending, all the rent and arrears, together with the costs, then and in such case all further proceedings on the said ejectment shall cease and be discontinued; and if such lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall, upon such proceedings as aforesaid, be relieved in equity, he and they shall have, hold, and enjoy the demised lands, according to the lease thereof made, without any new lease."

E June 26, 1895.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued :—It was admitted in the argument by the learned counsel for the defendant that, if on Feb. 21, 1894, the defendant had recovered possession by means of legal proceedings taken against Etheridge, the latter or his trustee in bankruptcy would be entitled to be relieved, both under the general jurisdiction of the court, and under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730. It was, however, strongly urged that no relief could be given where the lessor had recovered peaceable possession without the assistance of any court; and in support of this contention reliance was placed, first, on the circumstance that no case could be found in which such relief had been given, and secondly, on the preamble to s. 2 of the Act of 1730, which was said to amount to a recognition by the legislature that the right only existed where the demised property had been recovered by legal process. On behalf of the plaintiff it was suggested that the property was not really in the possession of the defendant at all, and there was some evidence that workmen in the employment of Etheridge had been on the property since possession was said to have been resumed by the defendant. In the view which I take I do not think it necessary for me to decide whether or no the defendant's possession was good legal possession. If it were, I should probably come to the conclusion that it was good, because from and after the date of Etheridge's bankruptcy the property vested in his trustee, and as against him the defendant was entitled, subject to any right of law, to re-enter and assume legal possession.

G Are the arguments as to the effect of the peaceable possession well founded? I will first consider the grounds on which such relief was formerly given by the Court of Chancery. In Wadman v. Calcraft (1) SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., says (10 Ves. at pp. 68, 69) :

I "The plaintiff seeks to be relieved against a forfeiture of this lease, which he states to have been incurred solely by nonpayment of rent, and if that is the ground of this ejectment, there is no doubt equity will relieve against the forfeiture; considering the purpose of the clause of re-entry to be only to secure the payment of rent, and that when the rent is paid the end is obtained; and therefore the landlord shall not be permitted to take advantage of the forfeiture."

In Sanders v. Pope (2) LORD ERSKINE, L.C., says (12 Ves. at p. 289) :

“There is no branch of the jurisdiction of this court more delicate than that which goes to restrain the exercise of a legal right. That jurisdiction rests only upon this principle—that one party is taking advantage of a forfeiture; and as a rigid exercise of the legal right would produce a hardship, a great loss and injury on the one hand arising from going to the full extent of the right, while on the other the party may have the full benefit of the contract, as originally framed, the court will interfere; where a clear mode of compensation can be discovered. Of this nature is the case, that constantly occurs, confirmed by statute [the Act of 1730], giving a more ready relief at law; a contract to pay rent, with a covenant and clause of re-entry for breach. The obvious intention is to secure the payment of the rent; that the landlord may not be put to his action of debt, coming from time to time against an insolvent estate; but may be enabled to recover possession of the premises. In that case equity is in the constant course of relieving the tenant, paying the rent and all expenses, and placing his landlord in exactly the same situation; and in that case it is not necessary that the failure in paying the rent should arise from accident, the miscarriage of a letter with a remittance, insolvency, or disease; but even against negligence, the tenant being solvent, and not prevented by any accidental circumstance, equity interferes; and upon payment of the rent and all expenses will not permit the tenant to be turned out of possession; considering, that in the one case frequently great hardship might be the consequence; in the other, the party being placed in the same situation, there is in general no hardship.”

In Davis v. West (3) LORD ERSKINE says (12 Ves. at p. 476) :

“In the late case of Sanders v. Pope (2) I was very unwilling to give relief against breach of other covenants, but was compelled by a series of authorities—Cage v. Russel (4), Northcote v. Duke (5), Hack v. Leonard (6), Wafer v. Mocato (7), Eaton v. Lyon (8)—establishing that, where covenants are broken, and there is no fraud, and the party is capable of giving complete compensation, it is the province of a court of equity to interfere, and give the relief against the forfeiture for breach of other covenants, as well as that for payment of rent; and the only distinction is, that in the latter case it is considered so clear, that the object of the clause for re-entry is only to secure the payment of the rent, that the legislature interposed, and made it unnecessary to come into equity; allowing the tenant, upon the terms and within the time specified by the Act [of 1730] to stop the ejectment; leaving the ancient jurisdiction of equity in every other case untouched.”

The view there expressed as to other covenants has not been altogether approved, but as regards relief from forfeiture of a lease the principle seems to be well established.

In Bowser v. Colby (9) the question was raised as to the redemption of a lease which had become forfeited. WIGRAM, V.-C., there says (1 Hare, at p. 128) :

“The next point taken was, that there are two different species of provisos in leases; in some, a common clause of re-entry on nonpayment of rent, thereby determining the lease and nothing more; in others, a proviso declaring that, if the rent is not paid, the lease shall be void; and there being in this case a proviso ‘that the lease shall become absolutely void,’ it is said that there is now nothing for the court to act upon—no lease existing which it can restore to the tenant, and therefore that the court will not interfere. If it could have been shown that a court of equity gave relief only before the landlord had entered, the argument might have been well founded, but, inasmuch as in most of the cases relief has been given upon bills filed after the landlord has entered, the argument must be fallacious; for when the landlord has entered, the lease is equally at an end in a court of law, whether there is a proviso for re-entry simply, or a proviso that it is to be void on nonpayment of rent."

After some further observations, which it is not necessary for me to read, he continues (ibid. at p. 130):

"It appears from the case of Taylor v. Knight (10) and from LORD ELDON'S observations in Hill v. Barclay (11), that the court formerly used to consider (the lease being gone at law by the re-entry) that the only way it could give relief was by creating a new lease, until the statute, recognising the right of the tenant to be relieved, dispensed with that form of relief, and declared that the last lease should be deemed to have continuance. The analogy to the case of mortgages fortifies the same reasoning. The object of the proviso in both cases is to secure to the landlord the payment of his rent; and the principle of the court is—whether right or wrong is not the question—that if the landlord has his rent paid him at any time, it is as beneficial to him as if it were paid on the prescribed day."

The authorities appear to me to establish that the ground on which courts of equity formerly gave relief was that the proviso for re-entry was, in the eye of the court, simply a security for the rent; and on principle I cannot see that it makes any difference whether the lessor avails himself of such security with or without the assistance of a court of law. It is, no doubt, remarkable that no reported case appears to have occurred in which relief was given where the landlord re-entered peaceably, and without bringing ejectment; but it is to be remembered that re-entry in this way can be but seldom effected. As to the preamble to s. 2 of the Act of 1730, that is as follows:

"Whereas, great inconveniences do frequently happen to lessors and landlords, in cases of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, by reason of the many niceties that attend re-entry at common law; and forasmuch as when a legal re-entry is made, the landlord or lessor must be at the expense, charge, and delay, of recovering in ejectment before he can obtain the actual possession of the demised premises; and it often happens that, after such re-entry made, the lessee or his assignee, upon one or more bills filed in the court of equity, not only holds out the lessor or landlord by an injunction from recovering the possession, but likewise, pending the said suit, do run much more in arrear, without giving any security for the rents due, when the said re-entry was made, or which shall or do afterwards incur."

It is to be observed that in terms the Act seems to contemplate the necessity of an ejectment in every case; but the existence of cases of peaceable re-entry on vacant premises may have been overlooked, or may have been considered of so infrequent occurrence that they were not considered to give rise to any grievance. The statute fixes a period of six months only from recovery in ejectment within which an application for relief may be made, and it is said that the whole evil which the Act was passed to remove would be re-introduced if it were to be held that the jurisdiction to give relief were to be applied in a case where peaceable possession had been taken.

Upon that two observations may be made: first, that, if the landlord desires to limit the time within which the tenant can apply for relief, he can avail himself of the processes established by statute for that; and secondly, that it does not follow that a court of equity would now grant relief at any distance of time from the happening of the event which gave rise to it. It appears to me that, inasmuch as the inconvenience of so doing has been recognised by the legislature, and a time has been fixed after which, in a case of ejectment, no proceedings for relief can be taken, a similar period might well be fixed, by analogy, within which an application for general relief in equity must be made. A court of equity would probably say that the action for relief must be brought within six months from the resumption of peaceable possession by the lessor.

I think, then, that if the lease had remained vested in Etheridge, or his trustee in bankruptcy, he or his trustee would have been entitled to relief. It was said, however, that the right was personal to the lessee, and that relief could not be given to his mortgagee. It is unnecessary to consider whether a mortgagee is, by virtue of his mortgage, entitled to be relieved from a forfeiture. It would appear from Hare v. Elms (12), that relief would not, as a rule, be given to an under-lessee or mortgagee in the absence of the original lessee; but in the present case the mortgagor has become bankrupt, and the mortgagee has obtained from the trustee in bankruptcy an assignment of the equity of redemption in consideration of a payment of £5. By s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, all property of the bankrupt vests in the trustee, and by s. 168 property includes things in action [see Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 19, 38, 167]. The right of the bankrupt to be relieved of a forfeiture appears to me to be a thing in action, and to have become vested in the trustee in bankruptcy; and the trustee was entitled to sell the right and assign it to a purchaser: Seear v. Lawson (13); Guy v. Churchill (14). I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to bring the action.

Lastly, it was contended that the plaintiff had deprived himself of his right to relief by the position which he took up in the interval between Feb. 21 and the bringing of the action, and, in particular, by the letter of May 4, 1894, in which he declined to pay anything to the defendant except the costs of a new lease. I am unable to take this view of the plaintiff's conduct. I think that the correspondence does not show a refusal by the plaintiff to pay the arrears of rent, but merely a refusal to pay certain sums of money which the defendant had no right to claim. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief for which he asks.

At the conclusion of the judgment a question was raised whether the plaintiff was entitled to the relief given without a new lease, or whether a new lease should be granted. STIRLING, J., directed minutes to be prepared and the case to come into the paper on June 29 to be spoken to on the minutes.

June 29, 1895. Minutes having been prepared, the case again came on.

STIRLING, J.—The point which has now been raised is a difficult one. I do not think, on the whole, that s. 212 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, should be read as limited to a case where proceedings in ejectment have been taken. It has already been decided by WIGRAM, V.-C., in Bowser v. Colby (9), that s. 211 does not apply where there has been no application for an injunction. Section 212 reverts to proceedings where there has been ejectment. The question is, whether the words "such lessee" and "such proceedings as aforesaid," relate merely to a lessee, and proceedings taken by him, when there have been proceedings in ejectment, or whether the section applies to any case where there is an application to a court consequent upon a forfeiture. The statute is a remedial one, and should, I think, be read as widely as possible. Probably what the legislature had in contemplation when the Act was passed was a case where there had been proceedings in ejectment, as that would be the most prominent case, but the latter part of the section is not, I think, so expressed as to compel me to hold that all proceedings are excluded where there has been no ejectment. I think, therefore, I may add to my judgment a declaration that the plaintiff shall have, hold, and enjoy the demised property, according to the leases thereof, mentioned in the statement of claim, without any new lease, following the words of s. 212 of the Act. He must, of course, pay the rent, and the defendant must thereupon deliver up possession to him. The plaintiff must bear the costs of the action, except so far as they have been increased by the defendant resisting his claim, and those costs must be borne by the defendant.

A tenant for life may, under s. 22 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882 [now s. 75 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1925], direct the particular investment in which capital money in the hands of the trustees shall be invested, and cannot be controlled by the trustees or the court so long as he honestly exercises his discretion and the investment directed is one authorised by the settlement.

Notes. The Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 21, 22, 53, have been repealed and replaced by the Settled Land Act, 1925, ss. 73, 75, 107 (1), respectively.

The purposes authorised for the application of capital moneys by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73, have been extended by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, s. 8 (5), Sched. II, para. 6 (34 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 394, 449); the Town and Country Planning Act, 1954, s. 66 (2) (ibid. 987); the Coalmining (Subsidence) Act, 1957, s. 11 (7) (37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 776); and the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1958, s. 35 (3) (38 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 386).

As to the investment of capital money under a settlement, see 34 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 544-545; and for cases see 40 DIGEST (Repl.) 818. For the Settled Land Act, 1925, ss. 73, 75, 107, see 23 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 161, 172, 229.

Summons taken out by the trustees of a settlement made by the late Lord Coleridge, in 1887, to obtain the decision of the court on the question whether the power of direction as to the investment of capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882, given to the tenant for life under the settlement by sub-s. (2) of s. 22 of the Act was limited to giving a general direction for investment under sub-s. (1) of s. 21, or whether the tenant for life was entitled to direct the investment of such moneys in any particular securities authorised by the settlement.

The present Lord Coleridge, the tenant for life in possession under the settlement, had under the powers of the Act sold a leasehold house in Sussex Square, forming part of the settled property, and he had directed the trustees to invest the moneys arising from such sale in debenture stock principally of certain commercial joint-stock companies, which stocks were investments authorised by the settlement, but were not such as the trustees would have selected if the selection had been left to their discretion. The prices of many of the stocks were considerably above par, the price of one stock which was liable to be paid off in twenty-eight years at par being £120 per £100 of stock, but the net annual proceeds of the investments as a whole did not much exceed the rate at £3 per cent.

Macnaghten for the tenant for life.

CHITTY, J.—This is an application by the trustees of the settlement executed by the late Lord Coleridge, in 1887, for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court on the question whether they will be justified in investing certain capital money which has arisen from a sale of a leasehold house, part of the settled property, according to the direction of the present Lord Coleridge, the tenant for life in possession. The sale was effected by him under his statutory power. The settlement contains a wide power of investment. It expressly refers to the Settled Land Act, 1882, and declares that capital money arising under that Act may be invested in the names of the trustees, or under their control in any investments in which trustees are by law authorised, or in other the various investments mentioned, including specifically the stocks, funds, debentures, mortgages, or securities of any corporation, company, or public body, municipal, commercial, or otherwise, in the United Kingdom or India, or any colony or dependency of the United Kingdom. The investments which the tenant for life has directed are all within the scope of the settlement power, but they are not such as the trustees themselves would, if they have any discretion in the matter, themselves select.

The question turns on ss. 21, 22, and 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. Section 21 enacts that capital money under the Act shall be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one, or partly in one and partly in another or others, of the modes after mentioned, and these modes are specified in the ten following sub-sections. This division into ten sub-sections is merely for the sake of clearness and convenience. Sub-section (1) runs thus :

“In investment on government securities [by sub-s. (10) (viii.) of s. 2 this term ‘securities’ includes stocks, funds, and shares] or on other securities on which the trustees of the settlement are by the settlement or by law authorised to invest trust money, or on”

other the securities mentioned in the sub-section. Section 22 enacts that the investment or other application of capital money by the trustees “shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, and in default thereof according to the discretion of the trustees.”

It was argued by counsel for the trustees that the only direction which the tenant for life could give to the trustees was to invest or apply the money according to some one or other of the ten sub-sections in s. 21, each sub-section being regarded as a whole, and that, in regard to the various modes of investment or application specified in each sub-section, the choice of the particular investment or application lay with the trustees. There is nothing in the Act to justify this construction; it would cut down the power of the tenant for life in a manner not contemplated by the legislature, and render it almost nugatory. The argument was abandoned, and rightly, by counsel, on my pointing out some of the results which would ensue from its adoption. The power thus conferred on a tenant for life of directing the mode of investment, and of selecting the particular investment, is no doubt extensive. The enactment is in accordance with the general policy of the Act. In cases falling within its provisions, the Act transfers, in regard to investment, a function ordinarily exercised by trustees from the trustees to the tenant for life. The only limitations imposed on him are those to be found in the Act itself—notably in s. 21 and s. 53. By s. 53 a tenant for life, in exercising any power under the Act, is bound to have regard to the interest of all parties entitled under the settlement, and in relation to the exercise thereof by him is deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties.

Supposing that this case had not fallen within the Act, and that the trustees had in exercise of their ordinary discretion selected these securities in good faith, their discretion could not have been questioned; they would have been acting within the scope of the authority conferred on them by the settlement. Similarly, the tenant for life, in the exercise of his statutory power, cannot be controlled by the trustees, or by the court, so long as he really and honestly exercises his discretion. This the present tenant for life has done; he has considered the question of the propriety of the investments, and has consulted a broker of good standing in the city of London, who has advised him on the subject. He has offered to produce an affidavit verifying the paper on which the broker's advice is given. This should be done. I hold, then, that the trustees will be safe in complying with the direction given, and that they are bound to comply with it.

Landlord and Tenant--Use and occupation--Action after end of period for which sought to make defendant liable--Period of tenancy fixed--Entry by tenant--Possession given up before end of period--Liability for whole period.

The plaintiff orally agreed to grant the defendant the exclusive possession of a plot of land for three bank holidays for £45. This was found to be, not an agreement for three separate lettings with a separate rent or price for each of the bank holidays, but one agreement for the possession and use of the land on the three occasions for a single lump rent or price for the three. The defendant used the land on the first of the bank holidays and made a payment on account. He did not, however, use the land on the other two bank holidays, although he could have done so. In an action, in which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to the balance of the sum of £45, and the defendant pleaded the absence of a written note or memorandum under the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4,

Held: (i) the defence based on the Statute of Frauds failed as there was an entry for the purpose of occupation under a single letting (although the period of the agreed letting was not continuous) and a payment of rent on account of the entry; (ii) the defendant was liable for the use and occupation of the land on the last two bank holidays even though he was not in actual occupation, it being sufficient that he had once entered on the land and could have gone on occupying it had he chosen to do so.

Notes. That part of the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4, which applied to "any contract or sale of lands, tenements or other hereditaments or any interest in or concerning them" has been replaced by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of His Honour JUDGE CHALMERS, sitting at Birmingham County Court, giving judgment for the plaintiff for £26 13s. 4d., in an action brought to recover the sum of £26 13s. 4d., balance of rent alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

The defendant, who was in the habit of attending fairs with "roundabouts," called upon the plaintiff in February, 1894, and said that he wished to have the use of some waste land belonging to the plaintiff, for the three bank holidays following, that is, Easter, Whitsuntide, and August, 1894, for the purpose of his performances. According to the evidence of the plaintiff—which the learned judge accepted—the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff £45 for the piece of ground for the three bank holidays, and in consideration of his pulling down a shed which was on the land, the defendant was to receive £5, which was to be allowed and spread over the three payments of £15 in respect of each of the three holidays. The defendant paid a deposit of £5. The defendant entered upon the land and occupied the same on the Easter bank holiday, and paid the sum of £8 6s. 8d., in respect of such occupation (which, with the deposit of £5 and £1 13s. 4d., the proportionate part of the allowance for pulling down the shed, made £15, the amount of the first instalment) but he did not occupy or use the land on the other two holidays although he could have done so and refused to pay in respect of the same. The plaintiff then brought this action to recover the balance of the rent due. The learned judge accepted the plaintiff's account, and found for him for £26 13s. 4d., but reserved judgment on the question of law that was raised for the defendant, namely, that s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds applied, and that there was no writing and no part performance to take the case out of the section. The learned judge held that there was a single entire contract for £45; that there was an entry under the contract on to the land, and a user of the land and a payment on account, which could only be referable to one entire agreement, and not to three separate agreements; that whether the contract be regarded as a lease, or as an agreement under s. 4, the statute had been complied with, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The defendant appealed.

By the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 14, it is provided: "And to obviate some difficulties that many times occur in the recovery of rents where the demises are not by deed . . . it shall and may be lawful to and for the landlord or landlords, where the agreement is not by deed, to recover a reasonable satisfaction for the lands, tenements or hereditaments held or occupied by the defendant or defendants in an action on the case for the use and occupation of what was so held or enjoyed; and if in evidence on the trial of such action any parol demise or any agreement (not being by deed) whereon a certain rent was reserved, shall appear, the plaintiff in such action shall not therefore be non-suited, but may make use thereof as an evidence of the quantum of the damages to be recovered."

C. C. Scott for the plaintiff.

Aug. 7, 1895. WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment of the court.—In this case it is agreed that we are to draw any inference of fact from the evidence as stated in the judge's notes which the judge might have drawn. We draw the inference that the parties intended that the defendant should have exclusive possession of the land for the three bank holidays. The judge has found that the contract was a single entire contract for £45, by which we understand him to mean

A that he finds that it was not an agreement for three lettings at a separate rent or price for each of the three bank holidays, but one agreement for the possession and use of the ground on the three occasions at a single lump rent or price of £45 for the three—in other words, for one letting. The defendant entered upon the land for the purpose of occupation under the agreement on one of the three days. After entry he made (as the county court judge finds) a payment of money on account, B which can be referable only to one entire agreement. He might have occupied had he chosen to do so on the two later days which the letting covered.

In order to maintain an action for "use and occupation," after the close of the period for which it is sought to make the party sued liable, actual occupation is not necessary; it is sufficient if once there has been an entry, provided that the defendant might have gone on occupying had he chosen to do so. He has "held" within the C Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 14, although he has not "enjoyed." On the facts the defence of the Statute of Frauds fails. There having been an entry for the purpose of occupation under an agreement for a single letting (although the period of the agreed letting was not continuous), at a single or lump rent or price, and a payment of rent on account of the entry, the plaintiff's right to recover the balance after the termination of the letting period is, in our judgment, not affected by the D fact that the agreement was a parol agreement.

H

Arrears of alimony under an order of the Divorce Court do not constitute a debt provable in bankruptcy, whether the arrears fall due before or after the making of the receiving order, and, consequently, a committal order may be made for the non-payment of such arrears.

Appeal by the husband (the defendant) from an order of His Honour JUDGE LUMLEY SMITH at Westminster County Court by which he discharged a stay imposed by the registrar on a previous order committing the husband to prison at the suit of his wife for the non-payment of arrears of alimony. G

On May 2, 1893, an order for maintenance was made against the husband by the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, to be paid in certain instalments. The husband failed to keep up his payments, and on June 29, 1896, a judgment summons was issued from the Westminster County Court, under Ord. 25, r. 17, to enforce payment of the five instalments which were in arrear. This summons was not, however, served, and on Oct. 13, 1896, another summons was issued. On this the judge made an order for committal for fourteen days, but suspended it till Dec. 1, being of opinion that the debtor had had the means to pay a portion of the debt, and he did this on the authority of Re Fryer, Ex parte Fryer (2). On Dec. 5, 1896, the plaintiff (the wife), not having applied for the issue of the warrant, the defendant (the husband) made an affidavit under Ord. 25, r. 30, of the County Court Rules, and in accordance with Form 58. H

That affidavit set out—(i) That under the Debtors Act, 1869, an order for committal had been made in default of payment under the order of May 2. (ii) That on Nov. 30 a receiving order had been made against the defendant. (iii) That the receiving order had been published in the LONDON GAZETTE. (iv) That the debt was provable in the bankruptcy. On that affidavit the registrar stayed the I

A order for commitment. The wife then applied to the judge to rescind the order of the Registrar, which he did, on the ground that, being for arrears of alimony which had accrued before the receiving order, it was not a debt provable in the bankruptcy. He gave leave to appeal, and stayed the order of commitment until the appeal was heard.

C July 21, 1897. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., read the following judgment in which HAWKINS, J., concurred.—This is an appeal against the order of His Honour JUDGE LUMLEY SMITH, discharging the order of the Registrar staying an order for commitment for non-payment of arrears of maintenance payable by a husband to a divorced wife. I think the order of the county court judge right. The order for maintenance made by the Divorce Court was an order made under s. 1 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866. It was an order for the payment of £9 a month for maintenance.

D It was decided by CAVE, J., in Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1), that arrears of alimony accruing after the adjudication were not provable in bankruptcy, and that an order under the Debtors Act, 1869, might be made in a proper case to enforce payment of such arrears. As a fact, in that case the wife had proved for the arrears of alimony, due at the date of adjudication, but there was no judicial decision as to her right to do so. The decision purports to be one under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, s. 1. I do not understand how that section applied to a case of judicial separation, but that is unimportant, as the judgment undoubtedly was one on the question of proof of debt for a sum payable under that section qua alimony, i.e., qua an allowance payable to a wife under a judicial separation, and Watkins v. Watkins (3) shows that it makes no difference if the sum is a periodical sum payable qua maintenance to a divorced wife.

E It follows that the only question to be decided in the present case is whether the decision in Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1) applies to arrears payable at the date of the receiving order. The considerations which led the Court of Appeal to hold that there could be no proof of arrears which had become due since the receiving order seem to have been that the sum payable was not a lump sum, but a payment to be made monthly or weekly, that the sum was payable out of personal earnings, that that which would go to his wife would take nothing from his creditors, that the payments could not be valued or have a capital value put upon them, because they might be at any time put an end to by a resumption of cohabitation. These considerations, except the last, all apply to permanent maintenance. The last consideration, viz., the impossibility of valuation, also, in my judgment, applies, although the impossibility is based on different facts in the case of permanent maintenance of a divorced woman, to those on which it is based in the case of permanent alimony for a judicially separated wife. Resumption of cohabitation between man and wife is no longer possible after divorce. The parties no longer stand in that relation, but the uncertainty as to the continuance of the obligation to make the payment exists, and exists not only as to future payments but also as to arrears, for the Divorce Court will wholly or partially relieve a husband from payment of arrears, if it is just to do so: De Blaquiére v. De Blaquiére (4). In fact, the practice of the Divorce Court so much treats the sums periodically payable under its order, as a fund for maintenance and not as property, and so much keeps its hand on the obligation to make these periodical payments for maintenance, that it is a standing rule that the court will not, in the absence of means, make an order enforcing more than one year's arrears. The very terms of s. 1 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, moreover show that the court has this power. Further than this, sub-s. (3) of s. 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, shows that a debt is equally provable whether the obligation arose before the receiving order or after it, at any time before discharge.

It follows that Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1) is an authority for the proposition that, so far as regards permanent alimony, there can be no proof for arrears arising before the receiving order unless there is something in the nature of arrears arising before the receiving order which make it possible in such a case to form that estimate which the court held in Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1) could not be formed in respect of the subsequent arrears; but it is to be observed that in Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1) it is in respect of arrears, and not in respect of future liabilities, that it was said that an order could be made on a judgment summons on the ground that there could be no proof.

With regard to Hardy v. Fothergill (5), there is in the judgment a good deal to make me say that the liability of the husband to pay under the order of the Divorce Court permanent alimony or permanent maintenance by periodical payment, was a liability capable of being estimated, but the Court of Appeal in Watkins v. Watkins (3) do not suggest that anything in Hardy and Fothergill (5) has overruled anything in Re Linton, Linton v. Linton (1), or in Re Hawkins, Ex parte Hawkins (6), and I am of opinion that the value of the liability, the continuance and extent of enforcement of which, both as to the past and future, is as entirely under the court making the original order for payment, as this is, as these orders for alimony and permanent maintenance are, and ought to be held, incapable of being fairly estimated.

WRIGHT, J. (read by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.).—If the liberty of the subject had not been in question, I should not have thought it necessary to express the doubt which I entertain. I only think it right to say that I think the case is governed by Hardy v. Fothergill (5), and that we ought to hold that arrears of alimony accrued due and payable before the receiving order are provable in bankruptcy, unless the court has declared them incapable of valuation.

A consent order made by the court to give effect to the compromise of a legal claim by the parties concerned can be set aside, not only on the ground of fraud, but for any reason which would afford a ground for setting aside the agreement on which the order was based, e.g., on the ground of a common mistake regarding a material fact.

Looms owned by a company were screwed to planks which in turn were nailed to the joists of the floor of premises subject to a mortgage.

Held: the looms were fixtures to which, on a claim to enforce their security by debenture holders, the mortgagees were entitled.

Appeal from a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.

In January, 1892, an action was commenced by debenture-holders against the defendant company in the present proceedings, Henry Lister & Son, Ltd., a manufacturing company, which was then in liquidation, to enforce their security, and the liquidator was appointed receiver. The plaintiffs in the present action, the Huddersfield Banking Co., Ltd., as mortgagees, claimed certain looms upon the premises of the company as being comprised in their securities. The premises were inspected on behalf of the parties to the action and the bank, and in view of the condition in which they were found the looms were considered to be loose chattels, not fixtures, and not included in the bank's securities, but belonging to the debenture-holders. On Oct. 17, 1892, an order by consent of all parties, including the bank, was made on a summons taken out in the action, directing that the looms should be sold and the proceeds paid to the receiver, which was done. The bank subsequently took out a summons, asking that the consent order might be set aside on the ground that the parties to the order had made a common mistake when they took the view that the looms were not included in the bank's securities. The court, by consent, made an order that the bank should be at liberty to bring such an action as they might be advised, and the bank thereupon brought an action against the company, the receiver, and the debenture-holders, alleging that the looms had recently been detached from the freehold, and asking for a declaration that the arrangements for the sale of the looms, and their assent to the order of Oct. 17, 1892, were agreed to and given under a mistake as to material facts which was caused by the wrongful acts of persons in the employment of the receiver. They also asked for an order that so much of the order of Oct. 17, 1892, as contained their consent to the compromise then effected should be set aside, and that the proceeds of sale belonged to them. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., held that, although the consent order had been drawn up, completed, and acted upon, the court had power to set it aside on any ground which would justify the court in setting aside an agreement between the parties; that upon the evidence the looms were fixtures, and so were included in the bank's securities; and that the bank were, therefore, entitled to the relief claimed. The defendants appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and Sheldon for the defendants.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Kershaw, Q.C., for the bank, were not called on to argue. I

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have had an opportunity of carefully considering this case, which is of considerable importance, and none of us requires to postpone delivering judgment.

An order was drawn up by consent, dated Oct. 17, 1892, it being made on the summons of the plaintiffs in a debenture-holders' action, which summons had been served on the plaintiff, the Huddersfield Banking Co. Let us consider what it was that the banking company were consenting to. They consented to the sale of

A these looms which everybody at that time thought were Messrs. Lister's chattels, and not included in the mortgage to the banking company. The looms were sold, and the receiver has got the money. Since then it has been found out that these thirty-three looms had been originally screwed down and had thereby become the property of the mortgagees. That fact was not previously known, and never supposed by anybody, but, it having been discovered, the banking company say by
B their present action: "Set aside that consent order on the ground that it was made under a common mistake, and, instead of the receiver handing over the money to the debenture-holders, order it to be handed over to us."

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., has made an order to that effect, and he has done it on the ground that the consent order was made by mistake, not of one side, but a common mistake of both sides, that there is jurisdiction to set it aside, and that it
C would be a failure of justice if he did not rectify that mistake. Messrs. Lister & Co., Ltd., appeal, and they contend that that order is wrong. They say, first of all, that there is no jurisdiction to set aside this consent order upon such materials as we have to deal with; and, as far as I understand it, they go so far as to say that a consent order can only be set aside on the ground of fraud. I dissent from that
D proposition entirely. A consent order I agree is an order, and so long as it stands it must be treated as such, and so long as it stands I think it is as good an estoppel as any other order. I have not the slightest doubt on that point. But that a consent order can be impeached not only on the ground of fraud but upon any grounds which invalidate the agreement it expresses in a more formal way than usual, I also have not the slightest doubt. If authority for that be wanted, it will
E be found in two cases which were referred to in the course of the argument, and which I do not propose to examine at any length. I mean Davenport v. Stafford (1) and A.-G. v. Tomline (2).

The only thing, to my mind, to be done on this point of setting aside a consent order is to see whether the agreement upon which it was based can be invalidated or not. If the agreement cannot be invalidated, the consent order is good. If
F it can be, the consent order is bad. On the point of jurisdiction, let us see what there is against setting aside the agreement. It is an agreement carried out by payment to the receiver; that is to say, the receiver sold the things under that agreement and got the money. But I take it that an agreement which is founded upon a common mistake, which mistake is impliedly treated as a condition that
G must exist in order to bring the agreement into operation, can be set aside formally if necessary, or treated as set aside and as invalid without any process or proceeding to do so. The moment you have got rid of this consent order, I take it that it is quite plain that an action against the receiver would lie at law for money had and received at the instance of the bank upon the ground of the mutual mistake—or rather, as it would be put at law, a total failure of consideration.

If authority for that be wanted, the cases will be found collected in the ordinary
H books on contract, but I would cite in particular Strickland v. Turner (Executrix of Lane) (3). That case related to the sale of an annuity, the annuitant having died shortly before the sale was executed. It was a sale by trustees who were vendors, and the purchaser knew nothing about the death of the annuitant. The money was paid over, and the purchaser brought an action to recover it back, and succeeded as a matter of course. On the same principle there are cases in equity, I among which Bingham v. Bingham (4) may be referred to as a leading example. There an agreement to purchase a property was set aside, and the money restored upon the ground that the property belonged to the man who had professed to buy it. It was a common mistake, and the transaction was set aside. I am aware that Bingham v. Bingham (4) has been occasionally criticised, and in some of the earlier editions of LORD ST. LEONARD'S book ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS he seemed to think that there was something wrong about it. In his later editions he changed his opinion. Bingham v. Bingham (4) was carefully examined in the House of Lords in Cooper v. Phibbs (5), and was distinctly affirmed. The principle of it was assented to and laid down to be correct; and in a still later case of Jones v. Clifford (6) HALL, V.-C., again went through the whole of the cases relied on, and came to the conclusion that Bingham v. Bingham (4) was sound law. As I understand the case, I cannot conceive on what ground there should be any question of its soundness. It appears to me to be in perfect accordance with well-settled principles of law, both of this country and of all civilised countries so far as I know. A

Therefore, there is no difficulty, so far as I can see, either in getting rid of the consent order, or in getting rid of the agreement on which it is founded, on the ground that it is based upon a mistake common to both parties. It was a mistake of this nature, that both parties believed that these thirty-three looms never had been fixed at all, whereas in fact they had. It was a common mistake of fact, on which mistake the agreement under which the receiver received the money was based. B C

I pass to another point. It was said that this was a compromise—that there were thirty-five of these looms, and the real arrangement was, not that the thirty-three should be sold upon the common mistake I have alluded to, but that something of this kind should be done. Lister & Co. claimed all the thirty-five looms, and the bank said, "Give us two; there are two screwed down." And Lister & Co. said: "You, the bank, may have two; but give us the balance." If that had been the true arrangement the aspect of the case would have been totally different. This part of the case was carefully considered by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., and he finds upon the facts, I think, after seeing the evidence of Mr. Taylor, who said distinctly that there never was any such give-and-take arrangement, that it would be impossible to adopt that view of the transaction. There was no compromise at all. It was simply an oversight. Then it was said that, supposing that to be so, these looms were unfixed before the mortgagees took possession, and that, on the authority of Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co. (7) and Gough v. Wood & Co. (8) that is sufficient, and the mortgagees cannot claim. Those cases, however, turned on the view that the chattels were unfixed, and properly unfixed, on the implied authority given by the mortgagees. It is impossible to say that these looms were unfixed by the implied authority given by the mortgagees. They were not unfixed in the ordinary course of trade or anything of that kind; they were unfixed on purpose to prevent the mortgagees claiming them. The proposition as to inferring an authority on the part of the mortgagees, or an implied authority on the part of the mortgagees to unfix them, or to come to the conclusion that they were unfixed in the ordinary course of trade for the purpose of being replaced by others, is untenable. Gough v. Wood & Co. (8) does not apply to the case. It appears to me that the appeal breaks down in every direction, and that it must be dismissed with costs. D E F G

LOPES, L.J. I am of the same opinion. There are two questions that arise in this case. The first is: Can the court set aside a consent order which has been passed and drawn up?, and, secondly: Are these thirty-three looms fixtures? H

I will deal with the question first with regard to whether they are fixtures, because, if the looms are not fixtures, the consent order would be right, and there would have been no mutual or common mistake. The learned judge found that the looms were so fixed to the freehold as to become part of it. I am of opinion that he was right. The conclusion I draw from the evidence is, that the machines were fixed to planks, and that the planks were fixed to the floor in such a way as to prevent the machines when in use moving either laterally or vertically. The words of the screws raise, to my mind, the idea of adhesion, or intention on the part of those placing the machines where they were placed to so fix them in position as that they would adhere to the floor. That was the view that the learned judge took, and, in my opinion, it was the right view. But it was said during the course of the argument that, even assuming all that, what was done was done by the manufacturers—I mean the annexation without the knowledge of the defendants I and without their authority—and, therefore, must be disregarded. I cannot adopt that contention. As I suggested during the course of the argument, suppose I order a carpenter to come into my room and fix a bookcase for me, and he fixes it in such a way that it becomes annexed to the freehold. It appears to me that I could not be heard to say that that was not done with my authority, that, therefore, annexation must be entirely disregarded, and that the chattel did not become part of the freehold. That is very much this case, because, as appears from the evidence of Mr. Illingworth, who was the maker or manufacturer, he was told by Listers to place these machines in situ, and to make a good job of it, and, acting on that instruction, he placed the machinery in the way that I have endeavoured to describe. I think, therefore, that it cannot be contended that these thirty-three looms were not fixed to the soil in such a way as to pass to the mortgagees.

Then it is said that there was a consent order which was drawn up and passed, and that the court has no jurisdiction to set it aside. It appears to me that the two cases which have been cited are sufficient authority to show that it can be set aside. One was Davenport v. Stafford (1), and the other A.-G. v. Tomline (2). The law seems to be that a consent order may be set aside for the same reasons as those on which you may set aside an agreement. It appears to me that, directly a common mistake is established, you can set aside an agreement. It cannot be contended here, I think, that there was not a common mistake. I rather understood that it was admitted that both parties honestly believed that these thirty-three looms were loose chattels at the time the consent order was made. But then it is said that the true nature and character of this transaction is that it was a compromise. The order to my mind points in the other direction. I rather conclude that the transaction was that the one party was satisfied that the two looms were fixed to the soil and the other party was satisfied that the thirty-three looms were not fixed to the soil, and, acting on that, not in any give-and-take way, but merely acting on this belief in that respect, they proceeded to this consent order.

Another point was made, namely, that these thirty-three looms were unfixed before the mortgagee took possession; but, as has been pointed out with reference to Gough v. Wood (8), that case proceeded upon the ground that they were unfixed by the implied authority of the mortgagees. Whereas in that case it might be said that they were removed in that way, that cannot be said in the present case. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the learned judge was right in his judgment in every respect, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, J. I will add a few words on my own behalf, because one of the questions raised in this case is of very considerable importance. It was denied in argument that the court had any jurisdiction whatever to set aside a consent order except in the case of fraud. What is a consent order? After all it is only the order of the court carrying out an agreement between the parties. Supposing the order out of the way, and the agreement only to exist, there can be no sort of doubt that the agreement could be set aside, not merely for fraud, but also in case it was based upon a mistake of material fact which was common to all the parties to it. If you may set aside an agreement on that ground, why should you not be able to set aside such an agreement simply because an order has been founded upon it? It seems to me that, both on principle and on authority, when once you find that an agreement has been come to between parties who were under a common mistake of a material fact, you may set aside the agreement, and this court has ample jurisdiction to set aside the order founded upon that agreement. Of course, if the order had been acted upon by them and interests of third parties had intervened, and so on, difficulties might arise, but nothing of that kind occurs here. Here we have got simply the parties to this agreement and order before us. No one else seems to have obtained any kind of interest under it. Therefore, it seems to me that, if it be made out that it proceeded upon the common mistake of a material fact, there is ample jurisdiction in the court to set it aside.

Did it or did it not? The only bodies or persons who were parties to this agreement and this consent order for this purpose were the original mortgagees and the subsequent debenture-holders. The question was which of the looms that were in the mortgaged property were in the nature of fixtures. It was agreed that two were and that thirty-three were not, but as to the thirty-three there does not seem to have been any dispute or consent whether they were fixtures or not. Experts examined what the condition of things was, and found that these thirty-three looms were completely loose. They came to the conclusion that they never had been fixed, and they were not treated as fixtures at all. That was not the fact. The fact was that they had been fixtures just as much as the two that were treated as fixtures. I think that the learned judge came correctly to the conclusion that they had been, owing to the manner in which they were fixed to the floor, as much fixtures as the two which it was agreed must be treated as fixtures.

But then this point was raised. It was said: "True they may have been at one time fixtures, but if they were, they were never fixed by the authority of the mortgagors who were in possession, but it was done without any authority from them at all." How stand the facts? As far as I can make out, these looms certainly had, when this question arose, or when the question was about to arise, been fixed to the floor for some months. During all that time the mortgagors were in possession, and it would be very difficult to persuade me that they must be treated as being entirely ignorant of the fact that these looms were fixed to the floor of their own mill. When I come to look at the evidence I find that they were affixed by the workmen of the mortgagors themselves, and that one of the mortgagors of this company, Mr. Lister, told the workmen to make a firm job of it. In pursuance of those general instructions what the workmen did was to lay down the planks on the floor to strengthen the floor. The planks were nailed down to the joists of the floor, and then upon those planks were fixed the looms, by screwing into the slots in the feet of the looms these screws that have been spoken of, which, as to the two looms, which were admitted to be fixtures, had heads wide enough to extend beyond the width of the slot itself, and so to hold those two looms down vertically, as well as to prevent them sliding horizontally. As to the thirty-three looms the evidence is clear that the workmen would have done to them exactly the same if they had had screws with heads of that same size, but they had not, though they seem to have had plenty of screws with heads of a smaller size, that is, heads of such size, I understand, that they would slide up and down in the slots. In order to prevent that they put under the heads of each of these smaller screws a washer of iron which extended beyond the sides of the slot, and which made them for this purpose equivalent to the larger screws that fastened down the two. That that was done by the authority of the mortgagors seems to me upon the evidence to be beyond the possibility of reasonable question.

I, therefore, think that there was a mistake of fact, and of a material fact, which was common both to the mortgagees and to the debenture-holders between whom this agreement was made, and on whose behalf this consent order was made. The mortgagees were induced to consent by ignorance of this material fact, of which the other side also were ignorant. That seems to me to enable this court to deal with, and to have enabled the learned judge in the court below to deal with, the consent order as he did deal with it, namely, to say that the agreement upon which it was founded was based upon a common mistake of a material fact, and that, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to set that agreement aside, and consequently to set aside the order which was founded upon it.

It was argued by counsel for the defendants that this was a compromise. What does a compromise mean? A compromise means, if there is a question of doubt and the parties agree: "We will not try it out, but we will settle it between ourselves by a give-and-take arrangement." I quite agree, if that was so, it would be extremely difficult to interfere with the order. But was there ever any doubt as to these thirty-three looms? Did either of the parties consider that they were fixtures? They did not. There never was any such doubt at all, and therefore, there certainly was no settlement of any doubt of that kind. I cannot see that in this case there is any element of a compromise. It seems to me that that argument fails in point of fact, because there was no question of doubt as to these thirty-three looms which was compromised by the arrangement that was made. Then it was suggested that there was one large arrangement, and that this was only a part of the large arrangement. We have looked into the evidence with regard to that, and as between the mortgagees and the mortgagors I can find nothing like an arrangement except as to the thirty-five looms; and that arrangement, so far as it was made, I have dealt with already, and have come to the conclusion that it proceeded upon a mistake of material fact.

Gough v. Wood & Co. (8), and the case before NORTH, J., of Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co. (7) were referred to as supporting the argument that, even if the looms had at one time been fixtures, yet before the mortgagees took possession the mortgagors had a right to remove them. As between mortgagor and mortgagee I simply dissent from that proposition entirely, and if Gough v. Wood & Co. (8) is examined it will be found that it proceeded absolutely and entirely upon this, that from the circumstances of that particular case the mortgagees must be taken to have assented to that which the mortgagors did in removing the fixtures before they took possession. Here there is no pretence for saying that this was not a removal of the looms in the course of the trade of the mortgagors. The analogy in Gough v. Wood & Co. (8) was that of a nurseryman who, in carrying on his business of a nurseryman, removed trees which had been planted in the soil for the purpose of selling them, and converted them into chattels and sold them. That would be a proper thing to do in the course of carrying on his business. But there is nothing of that kind here. Therefore, I think that those cases do not support the argument attempted to be founded upon them, and on the whole I agree with the decision of the learned judge in the court below. I think that this appeal fails, and that it must be dismissed with costs.

[I] Master and Servant—Duty of servant—After termination of service—Use of information and materials acquired during service—Injunction—Damages.

The good faith which exists between an employer and those in his employ renders it illegal, even in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, for the persons so employed to make use after the termination of the employment of any materials or any information acquired by them while they were in that confidential relationship. The court will grant an injunction to restrain such use, in addition to awarding damages.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., awarding the plaintiff damages in an action brought by the plaintiff, Adolphus Herman Louis, who carried on in London the business of a process-server, under the title of "Flowerdew & Co.," to restrain the defendant, Robert Smellie, who had recently started a similar business under the name of "Smellie & Co.," from pirating the plaintiff's register and index of agents and forms used in process-serving.

The plaintiff's business was extensive, he being employed by more than 2,000 solicitors for the purpose of process-serving, and having upwards of 1,000 agents throughout the United Kingdom. For carrying on his business he kept a register and index of his agents, and had also compiled many special forms of documents differing from those previously compiled by other persons. In 1886, after the plaintiff had been carrying on business for about two years, the defendant, then a lad, entered his service as a shorthand clerk, and for some time he was also employed by the plaintiff in the special business of process-serving. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant took advantage of his position to secretly make, for his own purposes, extracts from the plaintiff's register and index of agents, and to copy the plaintiff's forms. In October, 1894, the defendant left the plaintiff's employ and set up as a process-server on his own account, and for that purpose sent out circular cards copied, it was said, from the plaintiff's form of circular card, and also made use of the extracts and copies he had made while in the plaintiff's service.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action for an injunction and other relief, and also for damages. The action came on for trial before KEKEWICH, J., who decided in favour of the plaintiff, awarded him nominal damages but refused to grant an injunction. The plaintiff now appealed, claiming that he was entitled to an injunction as well as to damages.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is rather more serious than I was disposed at first to think, and I am satisfied that it is one of importance, and it is by no means an easy case. On the one hand we must bear in mind that the plaintiff, with regard to the clerk who left him, never took the trouble to get any covenant by the clerk not to carry on business in opposition to his master. We must, therefore, be very careful not to deal with the case as if the plaintiff had obtained the benefit of any such covenant. On the other hand, we must bear in mind that the defendant was entitled to set up in business in the absence of such a covenant in rivalry with his late employer. What he is not entitled to do is to make an unfair use in the carrying on of such a rival business of information acquired by him while he was acting as clerk to the plaintiff. The difficulty lies in drawing the line.

With respect to the law, I do not think it is necessary to say more than that it was laid down by this court with quite sufficient accuracy for this purpose in the case which has been referred to of Lamb v. Brans (1). The good faith which exists between an employer and those in his employ renders it improper and illegal for the persons so employed to make use after the termination of the employment of those matters which they learnt whilst they were in that confidential relationship. The defendant is perfectly entitled, when he starts as a rival in business to the plaintiff, to carry it on in the same way as his principal does. He has learnt to do it, and he is entitled to the benefit of that knowledge. The difficulty is in drawing the exact line as to what he may or may not do. But it is quite obvious to my mind, assuming for the moment that he has got copies of the plaintiff's register, or extracts, or memoranda, and so on, that he has no business to use them. Those are things that the court can forbid to be used. The plaintiff says that the defendant has in his possession or has had (I do not know whether he has it now or not) either copies of extracts from, or memoranda relating to, persons mentioned in this register of agents and index of agents. The plaintiff says that while the defendant was in his employ he got extracts from that register, or copies of it, which he has no right to use. The defendant denies that. It is for the plaintiff to make out his case, and that gives rise to some difficulty. It does not follow that, because the defendant is an untruthful witness as he obviously is, that the plaintiff's case is made out. It would be a very curious method of reasoning to infer that the plaintiff's case was true because the defendant had told lies. But counsel for the plaintiff does bring before us certain specific instances which I think force one to the inference that the defendant either has or has had a good deal more in the shape of extracts or memoranda made out of these books than the defendant admits. That he has a copy of the register I should doubt very much; but that he has more than is allowed, is, I think, established. Whether he has it now or not I do not know; he may have destroyed it; but he had it at one time.

[HIS LORDSHIP discussed the evidence and continued:] I think that enough is established to warrant our granting an injunction against the defendant upon the principle that the court is satisfied that he had these notes and was making an improper use of them, and that he would do it again now if he were not stopped. I think, therefore, an injunction ought to go, although not quite in the form in which the plaintiff asks for it. What I think the plaintiff is entitled to is an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from making use of any copies or extracts from the plaintiff's register of agents, or index, or any memorandum made or obtained by the defendant when in the plaintiff's employ relating to any person named in those books or either of them. That, I think, is as far as we can go. If the defendant happens to remember that there is an agent whose address he can find out from the ordinary directories, he is at liberty to do it. But he has no right to do that which he has done, and which he certainly would do again if he had the chance. As regards the plaintiff's forms, inasmuch as the defendant has certainly violated the plaintiff's rights in that respect, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction as to them. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from further printing and publishing, sending, delivering, or otherwise disposing of, sheets of letter-press paper, marked so and so, or any copy or copies thereof, and so on. It follows that the injunction will be added to the order made by KEKEWICH, J., and the defendant, of course, will have to pay the costs of the appeal.

LOPES, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. In the circumstances of this case the defendant no doubt was entitled to set up as a rival to the plaintiff, his employer. There being no covenant entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant would not, when the period of his contract terminated, carry on his business as a rival in trade, he was entitled to set up as a rival to the plaintiff. But, although he was entitled to set up as a rival to the plaintiff, he was not entitled to use any materials or any information which had been acquired by him when he was in the confidential employ of the plaintiff. He is not entitled to utilise any memoranda which he had obtained from the books of the plaintiff when he was in his employ. For instance, if he made a copy of the list of the plaintiff's agents, as is complained of in this case, he would not be entitled to use it. Clearly he had some memoranda, and I think it cannot be doubted that he used those memoranda. I think it is equally clear that, if this action had not been brought, he would have continued to use them. What he says is this: "True it is that I had these memoranda; but I have destroyed them—or I am ready and prepared to destroy them, and I will have no more." The question is whether we can believe him when he so says. He is a person, as is clearly established by the evidence, who is not trustworthy, and the learned judge in the court below so thought.

[His LORDSHIP discussed the evidence and continued:] But then it is said that, although the defendant may have perjured himself in that matter, he still may be telling the truth with regard to other matters. That, no doubt, is correct; but it is not only here that the defendant is to be believed; because, according to my view, the plaintiff makes out what I may call a prima facie case. He establishes circumstances with regard to certain specific matters which in my judgment raise the presumption that the defendant must have more materials in his possession than those which he says he has. If that is so, then, when we get that presumption raised on the part of the plaintiff, and also come to the conclusion that the defendant cannot with any degree of safety be believed, it seems to me that a case is made out by the plaintiff entitling him to relief, and entitling him, in my opinion, to an injunction. As to what form that injunction should take, is a matter about which it is necessary to take some care. The form of the injunction which the court is disposed to grant in this case has been stated by my brother LINDLEY, and, although it will not unduly press the defendant, having regard to the gross violation of confidence of which he has been guilty, still it will afford all the protection that is necessary for the plaintiff. I agree, therefore, that the injunction should be in the form which my brother has stated.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Of course, it is necessary for the plaintiff to make out his case on which the court will act. I think it is plain that the defendant had some memoranda, and the probability is that he had some memoranda showing the names of the agents. [His LORDSHIP considered the facts of the case and continued:] I do not think the case can be more favourably considered for the defendant than by treating it as if he had allowed the matter to go to the court without any evidence at all to the contrary, for I think his evidence is entirely unsatisfactory, and for the purpose of deciding this case I shall strike it out altogether. Then it becomes an action not met by any credible evidence at all, and in such a case I think the plaintiff has gone far enough (I do not say that he has done more than to raise a presumption) to entitle us to grant an injunction in general words, it being proved that the defendant had made memoranda, and made use of those memoranda. I think that the injunction granted by my brother LINDLEY will not be unduly oppressive, and I have no doubt that the defendant's business will not be much interfered with. But, if it is unduly oppressive, then I think that, having regard to the evidence put before us, it is the defendant's own fault for allowing the litigation to come into court.

By s. 44 of the Larceny Act, 1861 [see now s. 29 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916]: "Whosoever shall send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing demanding of any person with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any property . . . or other valuable thing, shall be guilty of a felony. . . ."

Threats of danger to a person by the making of accusations of misconduct against him amount to "menaces" within the meaning of the section, even though the accusations are not of criminal, but of immoral, conduct.

Case Stated by LAWRENCE, J., for the consideration of the court.

William Beswick Tomlinson was tried before LAWRENCE, J., at the assizes at Carnarvon on Oct. 26, 1894, on an indictment charging him, under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 44, with sending a letter to one John Thomas Morgan demanding money with menaces, and in a second count of the indictment with uttering the letter. It was proved at the trial that the prisoner, who was in the employment of the prosecutor, was discovered by the prosecutor and his wife in the act of connection with a woman named Kate Yende, in the prosecutor's stable, in consequence of which the prosecutor discharged the prisoner from his service. On June 25 the prosecutor received the following letter in the handwriting of the prisoner by post:

"18, Penrallt Street, Carnarvon.—On the rocks only had a day and half work since leaving Wrexham i want you to let me have 10s. so that i can get a can and Brush and if i do not get it on or before Tuesday morning i shall let Mrs. Morgan and your friends know of your doings with [Kate Yende] you must understand i am not going to suffer to hide you i have had enough of it. You are at liberty to show this to your lawyer or any one else if you like, but i shall certainly do it.—Yours, W. B. Tomlinson."

At the close of the case for the prosecution it was contended by the counsel for the prisoner that the menaces contained in the letter were not menaces within the meaning of s. 44 of the Larceny Act, 1861, but that such menaces must be of injury or violence to the person or property, or of accusation as contained in ss. 46 and 47 of the said statute. LAWRENCE, J., overruled the objection and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty. The prisoner was then released on his own recognisances until the determination of the Case. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the learned judge was right in holding that the threats contained in the letter above set out were such threats as were contemplated by s. 44 of the above-mentioned statute.

No counsel appeared on either side.

LORD RUSSELL, C.J. The point is not altogether free from difficulty; and it is a matter of regret that no one is instructed to argue it. The question turns upon the construction of s. 44 of the Larceny Act, 1861. But it is necessary, in order to determine the true construction of that section, to look at certain other sections cognate to the subject treated of in that section. It is enacted by s. 44 that: [HIS LORDSHIP read the section and continued:] Section 45 [see now s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916] provides that,

“Whosoever shall with menaces or by force demand any property, money, or with intent to steal the same, shall be guilty of felony.”

And s. 46 [see now s. 29 (1) (ii) and s. 29 (3) of the 1916 Act] provides that,

“Whosoever shall send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing, accusing, or threatening to accuse, any other person of any crime punishable by law with death or penal servitude for not less than seven years, or of any assault with intent to commit any rape, or of any attempt or endeavour to commit any rape, or of any infamous crime as hereinafter defined, with a view or intent in any of such cases to extort or gain by means of such letter or writing and property, etc., from any person,” shall be guilty of the offence, and subject to the punishment named in the statute. It is to be observed that the accusations to which that section relates are accusations of crime. The only other section which is material is s. 49 [see now s. 29 (4) of the 1916 Act] by which it is enacted that,

“It shall be immaterial whether the menaces or threats hereinbefore mentioned be of violence, injury, or accusation to be caused or made by the offender or any other person.”

To come back to what is the true construction of s. 44, and to whether the letter, of the writing and sending of which the prisoner has been found guilty, is evidence of a demanding with menaces any property, money, etc.: the point seems to have been taken by counsel for the prisoner that menaces within the meaning of that section means menaces importing a threat of injury to the person or property. In other words, menaces, or threats suggesting, if not coupled with, injury to the person or property. It is to be observed that the very next section draws a distinction between the two classes of menaces, because it says “with menaces or by force.” Therefore, it would seem that there was contemplated under the word “menaces” not merely threats of injury to the person or property, but menaces which would involve injury to a third person intended to be injured, and would induce the person to whom the menaces are addressed to part with money or valuable property. In this case we can well see how a menace of some indecency of conduct would be a holding out of a threat of injury much more serious than if the word were confined to the class of cases suggested. It would be matter of regret if the court felt itself compelled to put a narrow construction upon the term.

A It was further suggested that s. 49, which states that it shall be immaterial whether the menaces or threats mentioned in the previous sections be of violence, injury, or accusation to be caused or made by the offender or any other person, means violence to the person, injury to the person, or accusation in the sense in which those words are used in s. 46, which would be, so far as the word "accusation" is concerned, accusation of crime. Upon the whole, though not
B without doubt, I have come to the conclusion that the word "menaces" in s. 44 is to have a wider meaning than that suggested; and that it may well be held to include threats of danger by the making of accusations of misconduct, although that misconduct may not have amounted to a crime. I think there is some authority for that from what is given as the meaning of the word "menace" in the dictionaries. In some, as in JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY, its meaning is given as merely a "threat";
C but in WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY it is defined amongst other things as "the show of a probable evil or catastrophe." There being no definition of the precise meaning that the legislature intended, we have to look at the ordinary and natural meaning of the word, unless that meaning is displaced by anything contained in the statute. It does not seem to me that there is anything in the statute which would authorise us to displace that meaning.

D I have said that there is no authority; but, in R. v. Smith (1), a letter was written to the effect that if a sum of money was paid an impending catastrophe would be averted; and the question was, whether this came within the earlier Larceny Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29), s. 8, which enactment is in point of fact reproduced in the statute on which the indictment in the present case is based. In that case
E WILDE, C.J., said (19 L.J.M.C. at p. 82):

"Here the demand for money is accompanied by a statement that, if the money be not paid, the evil before spoken of in the letter will happen, and that evil is, that certain burglars of a most horrid gang will break into the house, burn the banker's books, and cause a stoppage of the bank. We are all of opinion that the terms of the letter amount to a distinct menace that F the evil will happen unless the money is paid."

There is one other case called R. v. Walton and Ogden (2). I refer to this case because, while stating what I conceive to be the meaning of the section, it points out what is the character of the threat before it comes within the section. There the prisoner had obtained money by threatening to execute a distress-warrant, which he had no authority to do, and the jury were directed, as a matter of law, that the conduct of the prisoner constituted a menace within the statute. The Court for Crown Cases Reserved, however, quashed the conviction on the ground that it was not for the judge to do more than lay down the principle upon which the jury ought to proceed in considering whether the threat which had been used there was or was not within the statute, and that it was not for him to say as a matter of law that it did amount to a menace within the statute. The court further held that I he ought to have told the jury that the question was whether or not the threat or words used, which were said to amount to a threat, was such as would naturally unsettle the mind of the person on whom it operates, and cause him to act in a way in which he would not otherwise act. In this case no complaint is made of the summing up of the learned judge; therefore, it must be assumed that that was the character of his summing up. It seems to me that there is no restriction placed by the statute upon the ordinary meaning of the term menaces in s. 44, and that, therefore, this conviction must be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B. I have come to the same conclusion.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case comes within s. 49 of the Act [see now s. 29 (4) of the Larceny Act, 1916]. I do not think that it is necessary even to rely upon that section, for I think that the injury with which a person is threatened should, in order to bring the menace within s. 44, receive a liberal interpretation, and that it does not mean an actionable injury only, but includes any injury which is calculated to do a person harm. I also think that the accusation is certainly not to be confined to cases which come within s. 46. What that section says is that, if the accusation takes the form of the cases stated in the section, then a larger amount of punishment is to be awarded. I think that the term "accusation" means that which in the ordinary sense of the term would amount to an accusation. I have always thought that persons who are practised upon in this way are not possessed of the ordinary powers of resisting; therefore, I think that a liberal interpretation should be put upon the words. In my opinion this conviction should be affirmed.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that in either ss. 45, 46, 47, or 49 are any words which would justify us in placing the restrictive meaning upon the words in s. 44 which it is sought to place upon them.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

By s. 25 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893: "Where a person having sold goods continues or is in possession of the goods, or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same."

In September, 1893, A. hired from the defendants B. & Co. cellar room for 4,500 dozen bottles of wine and deposited a large quantity of wine in their cellars. In January, 1894, A. sold to the plaintiffs 250 dozen bottles of port subject to an agreement that it should be left for a year in cellars to be provided by A. rent free. The plaintiffs were informed that the wine was in the cellars of B. & Co., but they never received a delivery order, and no notice of the sale was given to B. & Co. The plaintiffs paid for the wine. By a letter dated May 31, 1894, A. gave B. & Co. a lien on the wine in their cellars in consideration for an advance by them of £1,500, and by another letter dated Nov. 7, 1894, he pledged the same wine as security for two bills accepted by B. & Co. for his accommodation and for any further bills they might so accept. A. became bankrupt in March, 1895, and there was then a balance due from him to B. &

A Co., charged upon the wine bought by the plaintiffs. The trustee in bankruptcy and B. & Co. put up this wine for sale by auction. In an action by the plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain the sale,

B Held: there was no delivery or transfer of the goods or documents of title to B. & Co. within the meaning of s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1893, as A. had no property in the wine at the date of his letters, B. & Co. obtained no charge; and, therefore, the wine must be delivered to the plaintiffs, but without prejudice to the common law lien of B. & Co. for warehouse charges.

Notes. As to disposition by seller in possession, see 34 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 84 et seq.; and for cases see 39 DIGEST 535. For the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, see 22 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 985 et seq.

C Application by the plaintiffs in the action for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from selling certain goods.

In January, 1894, the plaintiffs, J. W. Nicholson & Co., purchased of one W. Goldsmith 250 dozen of port wine subject to an agreement that it should be allowed to remain for a year in cellars to be provided by Goldsmith rent free. The wine was part of a quantity belonging to Goldsmith then lying in the cellars of Messrs. D Gammage and Hollingum, from whom Goldsmith had in 1893 hired cellar room for not more than 4,500 dozen wines and spirits for five years at a yearly rent of £120. The day after the sale Goldsmith wrote to the plaintiffs:

"I beg to send invoice and delivery order for the port. If you wish to take delivery please arrange with Messrs. Gammage & Co. as this cellar is not always open."

E The plaintiffs duly received the invoice and paid for the wine, but the delivery order was not enclosed. The plaintiffs never received any delivery order, and gave no notice of the sale to Messrs. Gammage & Co. On May 31, 1894, Goldsmith wrote to Messrs. Gammage and Hollingum:

F "In consideration of your having advanced to me this day the sum of fifteen hundred pounds (£1,500) as a loan for twelve months at 7 per cent. per annum interest, I hereby give you as collateral security a lien on all wines and spirits now lying in your cellars."

And on Nov. 7, 1894:

G "In consideration of your accepting for my accommodation the two drafts enclosed, viz., £149 17s. due Feb. 5, 1895; £200 due Feb. 11, 1895, I give you as security for these and any other similar drafts you may hereafter accept for me all my stock of wines and spirits held by you over and above those you retain as security for your loan to me of May 31 last."

H In March, 1895, Goldsmith became bankrupt, and the defendant Harper was appointed his trustee. At the date of the bankruptcy there was due to Messrs. Gammage & Co., £2,391, of which £1,900 was secured upon wine other than that now in question. Messrs. Gammage & Co. claimed a charge upon the wine sold to the plaintiffs for the balance of £491. By arrangement between that firm and the trustee in bankruptcy the wine was put up for sale. On the sale being advertised the plaintiffs brought this action to restrain it, and now moved for an interlocutory injunction.

I The sections of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, on which the argument turned (apart from s. 25 (1) ) are as follows:

"Section 17.—(1.) Where there is a contract for the sale of specific or ascertained goods, the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such a time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred. (2.) For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, regard shall be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, and the circumstances of the case. Section 18. Unless a different intention appears, the following are rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer: Rule 1. Where there is an unconditional contract for the sale of specific goods, in a deliverable state, the property in the goods passes to the buyer when the contract is made, and it is immaterial whether the time of payment, or the time of delivery, or both, be postponed."

By the Factors Act, 1889, s. 1:

"For the purposes of this Act. . . (4) the expression 'document of title' shall include any bill of lading, dock warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate, and warrant or order for the delivery of goods, and any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented."

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Eve for the plaintiffs.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Rowden for the defendants Gammage and Hollingum.

NORTH, J.—I think the plaintiff has made out his case. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts of the case and continued:] On looking at ss. 17 and 18 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, it seems clear that the purchasers were entitled to the property in the goods. At the date of the purchase they did not wish to have possession of the goods, which were accordingly left with the vendor. On Jan. 16, 1894, the purchasers received a letter which informed them that the goods were in the possession of the defendants, Messrs. Gammage & Co., but it appears that they never received a delivery order which was said to have been sent them. In the spring of 1895 the plaintiffs became aware that the defendants were intending to sell the goods, and applied to the court to restrain the sale. The question to be decided is, whether the goods belong to the plaintiffs free from any claim by the defendants, or whether the defendants have established their claim. The goods were left by Goldsmith in the defendants' warehouse, and it was agreed that Goldsmith was to have cellar room for five years for a certain payment. After this Goldsmith became bankrupt.

The defendants say that they have a valid charge given them upon the wine by the two documents of May 31, 1894, and Nov. 7, 1894. The question arises whether Goldsmith was in a position to give the defendants a valid charge by these two documents. It turns upon the construction of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. There were cases before that Act with which I need not deal now. It is clear that Goldsmith could not give any charge upon goods unless they were really his. [HIS LORDSHIP read s. 25 and continued:] What is necessary to establish title is that a person, in the position which Goldsmith is in here, should make an actual delivery of the goods or a transfer of the documents of title to some person without notice. Either a delivery or transfer is necessary. The defendants were in possession long before sale, and continued in possession. The words of the section mean a delivery of goods, or where the goods are not delivered a handing over of the documents of title, which are certain well-known mercantile documents. There has been no delivery of goods since sale, and no transfer of the documents of title. The defendants' counsel says something has taken place which is not a delivery of the goods or a transfer of the documents of title, but a transfer of some interest in the goods. But the requirements of the Act must be observed. The defendants have been in possession ever since sale. There has been no delivery or transfer of any kind. I think that the defendants have failed to show that they are entitled to keep these goods, and must hand them over to the plaintiffs. But the defendants' lien for their charges for warehousing the goods is not to be prejudiced by anything that has been said to-day; that is to say, the common law right of lien on the goods is not to be interfered with.

Shipping—Bill of lading—Exception—Damage to cargo—Condition that due diligence exercised by owners to make ship seaworthy—Negligence of employee resulting in unseaworthiness—Liability of shipowners.

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which exempted the shipowners from liability for damage to cargo arising from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the ship, provided that due diligence had been exercised by the owners to make the ship in all respects seaworthy. Damage by sea water was caused to the goods during the voyage through the unseaworthiness of the vessel owing to a port, which was not readily accessible, being improperly caulked. The unseaworthiness of the vessel was due to the negligence of a carpenter employed by the shipowners to see that the vessel started on her voyage in a seaworthy condition. In an action brought by the shippers for the damage to the cargo,

Held: "owners" of the vessel in the exemption clause must be construed as including the agents by which they acted, so that they must exercise due diligence both personally and through their agents, and the negligence of the carpenter must be regarded as the negligence of the owners; accordingly, they had not exercised due diligence to make the ship seaworthy, they could not avail themselves of the exemption clause, and the shippers' action succeeded.

Appeal from the decision of LAWRENCE, J., sitting without a jury, at the trial of A the action at Liverpool.

The action was brought by the shippers of a cargo of oil cake against the owners of the steamship Rossmore for damage caused to the cargo during the voyage, the amount of which was agreed at £70. The oil cake was shipped at Baltimore, U.S.A., for carriage to Liverpool under a bill of lading, of which the material parts are as follows : B

“Shipped in good order and condition by J. C. Moore and Co. . . . for shipment in the s.s. Rossmore (from Baltimore for Liverpool) . . . 768 bags oil cake . . . and the said goods are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of Liverpool. . . . Neither the vessel, her owners, agents, or charterers shall become, or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting C from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of said vessel, provided due diligence has been exercised by her owners to make said vessel in all respects seaworthy, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied . . .
not accountable for the unseaworthiness of the vessel at the commencement of the voyage (provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness), or otherwise howsoever. It is also mutually agreed that D this shipment is subject to all the terms and provisions of, and all the exceptions from liability contained in, the Act of Congress of the United States approved on Feb. 13, 1893.”

By the Act of Congress of the United States approved on Feb. 13, 1893 (fifty-second Congress, sess. II, c. 105) [the Harter Act], it was provided : E

“Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that it shall not be lawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any clause, covenant, or agreement, whereby it, he, or they shall be relieved from liability for loss or F damage arising from negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery of any and all lawful merchandise or property committed to its or their charge. Any and all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void and of no effect. . . . 3. That if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise G due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the said vessel, nor shall the vessel, her owner or owners, charterers, agent, or master, H be held liable for losses arising from dangers of the sea or other navigable waters, acts of God, or public enemies, or the inherent defect, quality, or vice of the thing carried, or from insufficiency of package, or seizure under legal process, or from loss resulting from any act or omission of the shipper or owner of the goods, his agent or representative, or from saving or attempting to save life or property at sea, or from any deviation in rendering such service.” I

The Rossmore left Baltimore with a port improperly caulked, through which the sea-water entered during the voyage, and damage was thus caused to the cargo.
The port was not easily accessible during the voyage, and it was admitted that, according to the decision of the House of Lords in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (1), the vessel was unseaworthy. It was also admitted that this unseaworthiness was due to the negligence of the carpenter who had been employed by the shipowners to see that the vessel was in a seaworthy condition before she started on her voyage, but the shipowners relied upon their having exercised due diligence in em-employing an efficient carpenter for this purpose. At the trial of the action, LAWRENCE, J., gave judgment for the shippers, and the shipowners appealed.

Pickford, Q.C., and Bateson for the shipowners.

Walton, Q.C., and Carver for the shippers.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case we have to deal with a bill of lading, which, though given at Baltimore, in America, is an English bill of lading. By it English shipowners contracted with an English shipper for the carriage of certain goods from America to Liverpool. On the voyage the goods were damaged by seawater which got through a port that had not been properly fastened, and the shipper has now brought this action against the shipowner upon the bill of lading for breach of his agreement to deliver the goods in good order and condition. The shipowner says he is not liable, and he relies upon the exceptions in the bill of lading.

The facts as to the cause of the damage to the goods are not in dispute, and the sole question we have to decide is as to the true construction of the bill of lading. By reference to a United States Act of Congress, certain words have been brought into the bill. The American Act is not, as an Act of Congress, binding on the parties to this action, but the words used in it are by reference introduced into this bill. That is a very clumsy contrivance, but we have to construe the bill, reading into it the words so introduced by reference. First, we have a clause in it expressly providing that “neither the vessel, her owners, agents, or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel, provided due diligence has been exercised by her owners to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied.”

That means that, unless the obligation of the owners to use due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy has been fulfilled, the exception in the earlier part of the clause is not to have any effect. Then comes the clause which brings in the words of the American Act, the effect of which is to repeat over again some of the words which are already in the bill. That again is a very clumsy contrivance. However, we have got to construe the words.

The words of the Act which are brought into the bill are these: Section 1 provides that it shall not be lawful to insert in any bill of lading any clause whereby the owner of the vessel shall be relieved from liability for loss or damage arising from negligence in loading, stowing, keeping, or delivering the goods that have been shipped on the vessel. After that comes s. 3 which, say the owners, relieves them from liability for damage caused through the unseaworthiness of the vessel to the plaintiffs' goods. That seems to me to be rather nonsensical. The section provides that the owners shall not be held responsible for damage resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the vessel, upon the condition that they shall have exercised due diligence to make the vessel in all respects seaworthy. In the present case, the vessel was not seaworthy, but the owners contend that they are not liable for the resulting damage to the goods of the plaintiffs on the ground that they used due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy.

It is argued that, if the owner of a ship has done all that he personally could do to make his ship seaworthy, but through the fault of one of his servants she is not seaworthy, he is protected by the words of s. 3 from liability for the consequences. The owners of the Rossmore were not at Baltimore when she started on her voyage, nor were their managers there, and that was known to the parties to this action. How can it be said that anyone supposed that the owners were there, personally seeing what was being done to make the ship seaworthy? It seems to me obvious that in this clause “owners” must include not only the owners personally, but also their agents, whose business it is to see that the ship starts on her voyage in a seaworthy condition. If the owners' agent appointed a carpenter, he ought to have seen that the carpenter did what was necessary to make the ship seaworthy. If the A carpenter himself was the owners' agent, then it was still his duty to make the ship seaworthy. Here the ship was not seaworthy when she started on her voyage, and whether that was the fault of the agent or the carpenter, it was the fault of the person who was bound to attend to the owners' duty to see that the ship started in a seaworthy condition. The ship started with a port open. If that had B been all, and the port could have been shut immediately it became necessary, the ship would not have been unseaworthy. It is true that it would have been possible to fasten the port during the voyage, but the ship was so loaded that there was no facility for doing so after the voyage had begun. It could not have been shut without considerable exertion, as the crew would have to be employed for some time in moving the cargo, in order to get at the port. In the meantime, while they C were doing that, the water would have been coming in through the port, and doing damage to the cargo.

The result is that this ship was not seaworthy at starting, and that was so through the fault of some agent of the owners, whose duty it was to see that she started in a seaworthy condition. Therefore, the owners have not used due diligence, through their servant, to make the ship in all respects seaworthy. The two cases cited by the D shipowners, Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity
Association (2) and Franklin Sugar Refining Co. v. Steamship Sylvia (3), have no bearing upon this case. The owners have not fulfilled their duty, and are not relieved from responsibility by the bill of lading. The appeal is dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—Nothing could be more inartistically drawn up than this bill of E lading. On the whole the result of the provision as to relief of the owners from liability if they have exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy, and of the words which have been incorporated from the United States Act of Congress, seems to me to be this. The owners meant that, upon the fulfilment of certain conditions, they should be exempt from liability for any damage to the goods arising from "faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the ship." F
Those last words I will agree are equivalent to faults or errors in the management of the ship during the voyage, because it seems to me quite plain that the owners must have exercised due diligence in making the ship in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, before they are to be entitled to the exemption. That seems to me to be fully expressed in the bill of lading without any reference to the incorporated words of the American Act, because the express words used G in the bill are much the same as the words used in the Act. Not only is the bill badly drawn, but the wording of the Act itself seems to me most inartistic, ss. 1 and 2 being somewhat contradictory, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out.
But, however that may be, the meaning of these clauses in the bill are that, provided the owner has fulfilled certain conditions, he is not to be held liable for "faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the ship." The point that was H argued was, that there had not been any such fault or error in this case. What happened was this. The ship put to sea, with one of her ports insufficiently fastened, so that water got into the ship and damaged the cargo. It is unnecessary for me to give any opinion whether that was a "fault or error in navigation or in the management of the vessel," but I confess I should be inclined to think that those words would apply to faults or errors in sailing the ship during her voyage, and I would not include the matter which caused the damage in this case. But it is not necessary to give a decided opinion on this point. The real point is whether the owners exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and thereby fulfilled the condition of their exemption from liability for the damage to the goods. After the decision of the House of Lords in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (1) it cannot be denied that the ship was unseaworthy. LORD BLACKBURN there said that, if a ship went to sea with a port unfastened, and it would take a great deal of time to remove the cargo in order to get at it and fasten it, the ship would be unseaworthy; but if

A the port could be shut at a moment's notice if the sea became rough, then the ship could not be called unseaworthy. Those words of LORD BLACKBURN were referred to with approval by LORD HERSCHELL in Hedley v. Pinkney & Sons Steamship Co. (4). Therefore, it is clear that the Rossmore was unseaworthy when she left Baltimore. The essential point in this case is whether that unseaworthiness was owing to a want of due diligence on the part of the owners. The owners say it was not, because they had appointed a fit and proper carpenter to see that the ship was seaworthy. I cannot agree that that is an answer to the question. The contract is that the owners shall, if not personally, at least by the eyes of proper and competent agents, be sure that the ship is seaworthy before she leaves the port. It is obvious that the owners themselves cannot make the ship seaworthy. They must act through agents. Therefore, the word "owners" in this clause must be construed as including the agents by whom they act. There is nothing in the bill to exempt the owners from the negligence of their agent, even if they should appoint the best they could find. It cannot be said that the owners fulfilled their duties under this bill of lading by appointing a competent agent. I think the negligence of the carpenter was the negligence of the owners. As they have been negligent in sending the ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition, they have not fulfilled the condition that they should exercise due diligence in the matter, and, therefore, they cannot rely upon the exemption from liability. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by the owners of goods which were damaged by sea-water during their carriage on the defendants' ship. They sue the shipowners for breach of their agreement to deliver the goods in good order and condition. The shipowners rely on the exemptions from liability contained in the bill of lading. It is clear that the ship was not seaworthy when she sailed from Baltimore, and that by reason of her unseaworthiness the plaintiffs' goods were damaged. The owners, however, claim to be exempt from liability under a clause in the bill of lading which incorporates in the bill the words of an American Act of Congress. The bill must be construed as if the words of that Act were written out in it. Sections 1 and 2 are in favour of the shipper, and provide that it shall not be lawful for a shipowner to exempt himself from liability for damage to the cargo arising from the negligence of himself or his crew. Section 3 is in favour of the shipowner, and provides for his exemption from liability in certain cases if he shall have exercised due diligence to make the vessel in all respects seaworthy. Does that mean that by means of his own eyes and hands he is to make the ship seaworthy? It is impossible that that should be the meaning. It must mean that he is to exercise due diligence both personally and through his agent. That is what the defendants have to prove here. It is not denied that the carpenter employed by the shipowners did not use due diligence in seeing that the ship was seaworthy when she left Baltimore. Therefore, the shipowners have not shown that they have fulfilled the condition without which the rest of the clause exempting them from liability does not come into play. It is, therefore, unnecessary to give any opinion as to the meaning of the words used in the other part of the clause, "faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the ship." One word with regard to Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association (2). That case has no application to this. It arose on a policy of insurance against loss or damage to goods caused by the "improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods." A loss was caused by water getting through a port which had been insufficiently fastened and damaging the goods. The court held that the damage arose from improper navigation of the ship. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

The plaintiff was entitled under a will to the sum of £100, subject to the life interest therein of the testator's widow, who was eighty-four years of age. The testator died in July, 1894, and probate of his will was granted in August. In November the plaintiff, being desirous of raising money on the security of her reversionary interest, asked the trustees for the particulars of the securities in which the estate was invested. Correspondence took place between the parties, and in a letter of Dec. 11 the trustees said that at the date of the proof of the will the securities consisted of a variety of foreign railway and government bonds, and also a considerable quantity of English railway stock, and that the net amount of the personal estate was £12,286 2s. 11d., but they refused to add to these particulars, which they said they regarded as satisfactory. On an originating summons taken out by the plaintiff asking that the trustees be ordered to furnish her with particulars of the trust investments,

Held: the plaintiff was strictly entitled to the particulars of the investments of the trust estate, and the trustees must furnish them to her, but while the trustees had acted unreasonably in refusing the information, the plaintiff and her solicitor had also acted unreasonably in issuing the summons, and, both sides being in the wrong, there would be no order as to the costs, either on appeal or in the court below, except that the plaintiff's solicitor should be disallowed all costs as against her.

Appeal from a decision of NORTH, J., on an originating summons taken out by a cestui que trust against trustees for an order for information regarding the trust estate.

By his will, dated Feb. 13, 1891, the testator, William Dartnall, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to the defendants, E. Goddard and W. F. G. Roberts, upon trust for conversion, and after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and the legacies bequeathed by his will or any codicil thereto, to stand possessed of the residue upon trust to pay the income arising therefrom to his wife during her life, and after her death to divide the sum of £900 equally between the children of his cousin, Thomas Dartnall, living at the death of the testator, and the issue then living of any such child who might have died in the testator's lifetime, in manner therein mentioned, and then to divide the residue of his estate among certain other persons. The will contained no investment

A clause, but directed that the executors and trustees should permit the personal estate invested at the testator's decease in or upon any securities yielding income to continue in the same state of investment so long as they should think fit. The testator died on July 23, 1894, and his will was duly proved by the defendants in the following August. His widow was still alive. The plaintiff, Mrs. E. S. Sawyer, was one of the nine children of Thomas Dartnall, and was desirous of raising some money on the security of her reversionary interest in order to assist her husband in his business, and, accordingly, on Nov. 26, 1894, her solicitors wrote to the defendant Goddard the following letter :

"We have been instructed by Mrs. Edith Sarah Sawyer, one of the children of Mr. Thomas Dartnall, with reference to her interest under the will of William Dartnall, of which you are one of the trustees. We understand that she is entitled to a ninth of a sum of £900 bequeathed to the children of Thomas Dartnall living at the testator's death. Perhaps we had better send you a few questions, and we accordingly inclose same, and shall be glad if you will favour us with replies thereto. We inclose Mrs. Sawyer's authority to the trustees to give us the information."

On Nov. 28 the trustees' solicitors replied :

"Your letter of the 2nd inst. with inclosure has been handed to us. We first of all do not understand the object of the inquiries which you desired to have answered, or any reason given why these requisitions should be put. Are we to conclude that your clients contemplate hostile proceedings against the trustees, and, if so, on what ground? We are prepared to give such information as our clients may be reasonably required to give, and on the usual terms."

The plaintiff's solicitors replied :

"The reason the inquiries have been made is that Mrs. Sawyer is about to mortgage her interest under the will. No hostile proceedings against the trustees have been contemplated or thought of. Kindly, therefore, let us have the replies, and we shall be happy to pay your charges."

On Nov. 30 the trustees' solicitors wrote as follows :

"We have your letter of to-day, and are glad to notice what you say with regard to the object of your inquiries. We will see the executors upon the subject of your requisitions, and when they are ready for delivery we will let you know."

On Dec. 6 the trustees' solicitors replied :

"We have seen our client (the senior executor) and have obtained the information you wish, so that the answers to the requisitions could be had by you at any time on your sending down for them and upon payment of our charges (£1 11s. 6d.)."

On Dec. 8 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote as follows :

"We are obliged by the replies to the questions. Referring to question 3 and reply thereto please send us a statement showing the investments forming the trust estate of the testator."

On Dec. 11 the trustees' solicitors replied :

"We have seen our client upon your letter of the 8th inst., and he considers that ample particulars have already been given, and therefore, will not instruct us to furnish particulars of the present investments. We will say generally that at the date of proof of the will the securities consisted of a variety of foreign railway and government bonds, and also a considerable quantity of English railway stock. The amount at which the personal estate was sworn was £12,286 12s. net. so that you may draw your conclusion as to the security of Mrs. Sawyer. You will have examined the will and will have observed that the executors have a very wide power, viz., that of continuing the investments in the same state as they were at the testator's decease, providing that they yield income. We cannot add to these particulars, which we trust will be now considered satisfactory."

The questions sent in the letter of Nov. 26 were as follows :

"1. Who has the probate will of William Dartnall and trust securities for the £900? 2. Who are the present trustees of the will, and what are their addresses and descriptions? 3. Please state how the £900 bequeathed to the children of Thomas Dartnall is invested. 4. Have the trustees received notice of any sale, settlement, or mortgage of, or other incumbrance on or dealings with the share or interest of Mrs. Sawyer, a daughter of Thomas Dartnall, in the £900, and, if so, what? 5. Do you know the age of Mrs. Eliza Dartnall, the tenant for life? If so, please state same. 6. Do you know the address of the tenant for life? If so please state same. 7. Have the succession or legacy duties been paid? 8. Have the testator's debts been paid? 9. Have all the legacies been paid? If not, what legacies are there to pay. 10. Has the estate or trust been administered in Chancery? 11. What is the address of Mr. Roberts (one of the trustees)?"

The answers referred to in the letter of Dec. 6 were as follows :

"1. Probate of the will is in the possession of the first named executor, Mr. Edmund Goddard. See answer 3 for remainder of question. 2. The same persons occupy the positions of executor and trustees, their names are: [The names and addresses were then given.] 3. There has been no appropriation of securities, nor is it necessary or desirable there should be until the life tenant of the whole estate died. 4. No. 5. Mrs. Eliza Dartnall is believed to be about eighty-four years of age. 6. Dorking, Surrey. 7. No; the time has not arrived for doing so. 8. The statutory notice has expired. All debts of which the executors have any knowledge have been paid. 9. The period allowed for payment of legacies expires in July, 1895. A perusal of the will shows that the pecuniary legacies payable at once are trifling. 10. No. 11. See answer 2."

On Dec. 14, 1894, an originating summons was taken out on behalf of Mrs. E. S. Sawyer, the trustees being the defendants, claiming :

"1. That the defendants, who are the trustees of the said will, may be ordered to furnish the plaintiff with proper particulars and accounts of the real and personal estate of the testator, devised and bequeathed to the defendants by the testator upon the trusts declared by his said will, and the investments thereof; and that the defendants be ordered to sign proper authorities to the railway and other companies in which any part of the trust funds may be invested to supply information to the plaintiff as to the amount of stock or shares, and in whose names the same stand. 2. That the estate of the testator may be administered under the direction of the court if and so far as may be necessary. 3. That the defendants do pay the costs of and incident to this application."

The executors and trustees made an affidavit in opposition to the summons, in which they stated that part of the testator's estate consisted of holdings in twenty-five different colonial or foreign government bonds or stocks, or proprietary shares or debentures in public companies; that his debts amounted to £18, and his funeral expenses to £22 15s.; that the net value of the estate was £12,286 2s. 11d., upon which sum probate and estate duty were paid. They also stated that they had caused the statutory notice to creditors to be inserted, and the period fixed thereby had expired on Oct. 20, 1894, and that no claims had been sent in.

A The defendant Goddard referred to the receipt of the questions mentioned, and said that, when asked for the details of the investments, he instructed his solicitors that, in his judgment, ample particulars had been furnished, and there was no necessity to do more. The defendant Roberts deposed that he called on the plaintiff to endeavour to persuade her to abandon the proceedings, and to point out to her how impossible it was to suppose that they would benefit her, and that she said it was her solicitor, Mr. Mear (to whom she had gone for an advance of money, and through whom she received £20), who advised her to take the proceedings, and that before she would authorise the proceedings he had expressly said that the costs would come out of the estate. The defendants also stated that they had received notice that by an indenture dated Dec. 20, 1894, the plaintiff had assigned her share and interest in the legacy to the Legal Reversionary Society, Ltd., and they submitted that they had given ample particulars to the plaintiff, and that the action was not brought bona fide, but for the purpose of incurring costs, and involving the estate in lengthy and expensive proceedings.

D The plaintiff and Mr. Mear made an affidavit in reply, in which the plaintiff said that the defendant Roberts called on her as stated, and told her she could not compel the trustees to give her information as to what the trust funds were invested in, and that she would not get it; that her solicitors had all the information she was entitled to; that she had better stop the proceedings; and that she would have to pay all the costs out of the £100. She also stated that she wished to raise the money to assist her husband, who had lately started a business; and that, at her urgent request, just prior to Christmas day, Mr. Mear induced the Legal Reversionary Society, Ltd., to lend her £27 to enable her to pay the rent of the premises in which her husband carried on his business, and which was in arrear, and thereby prevent a distress for rent which would have resulted in the loss of the business. Mr. Mear stated that, when the plaintiff applied to him to advise her whether she could raise money on a mortgage of her reversionary interest, he advised her that she could do so on ascertaining what the investments forming the testator's estate consisted of; that from his experience as a director and solicitor of an insurance company he knew that it would be practically impossible for the plaintiff to raise a loan on mortgage of her interest without such particulars being obtained; and that for the replies to the questions his firm paid the defendants' solicitors £1 11s. 6d. on behalf of the plaintiff. He also said he did not advise the plaintiff that the costs of these proceedings would come out of the estate, but told her that, in his opinion, the trustees' refusal to give particulars of the investments was unreasonable; that she was entitled to have such particulars; and that, as the trustees refused to furnish them, he thought the court would visit them with the cost of proceedings to obtain them.

The summons came before NORTH, J., in chambers and was dismissed with costs to be paid by the plaintiff, the plaintiff's solicitors being disallowed their costs of the application against her, and being ordered to pay to the plaintiff the costs by the order directed to be paid by her to the defendants. The plaintiff and her solicitors appealed.

II LORD HALSBURY. —I confess I have the greatest possible difficulty in apportioning the blame, which appears to me to rest on both sides. The application made on behalf of the plaintiff to the trustees for particulars of the trust estate and the investments was, in my opinion, a just and proper one, and they ought to have complied with the request, and I see no reason why the trustees should not grant it. They did not base their objection upon the fact that the application was made within five months of the testator's death, and I am wholly unable to understand what their objection was. If the matter stopped there, the order asked for by this summons directing the trustees to give those particulars ought to have been made, and the trustees ordered to pay the costs of the application. But the matter does not stop there. A correspondence then took place between the parties, and three days after the last letter of the trustees, dated Dec. 11, this originating summons was taken out, the trustees being the defendants, which is of a hostile character, and asks that the trustees may be ordered to pay the costs of it. When the matter came before NORTH, J., the trustees still adhered to their original view that they had given ample information to the plaintiff, and they made no offer to give her more. I think the plaintiff was entitled to the information she asked, although she was interested in only a small sum, and I confess I am unable to understand the decision of NORTH, J. Both parties had been unreasonable, but he dismissed the summons with costs, and ordered that the plaintiff's solicitors should not only be disallowed any costs against the plaintiff, but should repay all the costs which she was called on to pay. I do not think that is a proper application to the transaction of Ord. 65, r. 11. I think the order of NORTH, J., must be discharged, and the trustees must be ordered to give the particulars asked for. Considering all the circumstances under which this litigation was commenced, there should be no order as to the costs either here or below, except that the plaintiff's solicitors shall be disallowed all costs as against her, for, although I do not think it right to order the solicitors to pay costs in this case, I do not think they ought to have any costs from their client.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The difficulty in this case is to do justice with reference to these costs, which must now be very considerable. It was unfortunate, to say the least, that the trustees' solicitors wrote the letter of Dec. 11, 1894, declining to give any further particulars. I do not think any injustice was done to the plaintiff by the refusal to give those particulars, because I do not believe that practically she wanted information as to the investments of the trust estate; but the trustees were unreasonable, because in strict right the plaintiff was entitled to the further information which she asked for. But then this summons was immediately taken out without any further communication with the trustees or their solicitors, and was a very hostile summons. In my opinion, the order of NORTH, J., went too far, though I think he was quite right in endeavouring to save the testator's estate as far as possible from the costs of this litigation. I think the right order will be as follows: Discharge the order of NORTH, J.; direct the trustees to give a list of the investments of the testator's estate; no order as to the costs of the appeal or of the proceedings before NORTH, J., except that the plaintiff's solicitors are to be disallowed all costs as against her.

LLANDUDNO URBAN COUNCIL v. WOODS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Cozens-Hardy, J.), July 25, 26, August 2, 1899]

63 J.P. 775; 48 W.R. 43; 43 Sol. Jo. 689]Foreshore—Right of public to enter on—Navigation or fishing—Rights acquired by custom or prescription—Need for strict proof.

The foreshore is not a highway in the full sense of the word, and the public have no right at common law to enter on it, when dry, except for the purposes of navigation or fishing. More extensive rights may be acquired by custom or prescription, but the existence of such rights will not be presumed, and must be strictly proved.

Blundell v. Catterall (1) (1821), 5 B. & Ald. 268, applied.

The plaintiffs, the local authority of L., were lessees of the foreshore at L. from the Crown. The defendant, a clergyman of the Church of England, having held services and delivered addresses on the foreshore without the plaintiffs' consent, the plaintiffs brought an action against him claiming a declaration that he was not entitled without their consent to hold meetings, or deliver addresses, lectures or sermons on any part of the foreshore in lease from the Crown, and an injunction to restrain him from so doing. There was no evidence that the defendant had caused a breach of the peace, nor of disorder, nor of inconvenience, except of the most trivial kind, to members of the public resorting to the foreshore.

Held: the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration asked for, but the matter was too trivial for an injunction to be granted.

By an indenture of lease, the foreshore of the town of Llandudno was demised by the Crown to the plaintiffs' predecessors in title for a term of years expiring in October, 1901. The plaintiffs had also jurisdiction over the promenade, for the regulation of which they had, in 1878, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, made certain byelaws. The defendant was a clergyman of the Church of England, and was carrying on an anti-Ritualistic crusade in North Wales, in the course of which he visited Llandudno. In July, 1898, he requested the plaintiffs to allow him to hold religious services on the promenade and foreshore, which was refused. Nevertheless, he held meetings on the promenade, and was convicted before the magistrates of committing a breach of the byelaws, and fined. Immediately after the conviction, the defendant began to hold meetings and deliver addresses A on the beach or foreshore.

The plaintiffs brought this action claiming a declaration that the defendant was not entitled without their consent to hold meetings or deliver addresses, lectures, or sermons on any part of the foreshore, and an injunction to restrain him from so doing. They alleged that the matter and manner of the defendant's addresses gave B offence to the inhabitants and visitors of the town; that large crowds assembled and angry discussions took place, and that the meetings seriously interfered with the free use and ordinary enjoyment by the public of the beach and foreshore. An interim injunction was obtained in August, 1898, and the action now came on for trial, the defendant contending that he had a right as a member of the public to do as he had done.

The defendant appeared in person.

Aug. 2, 1899. COZENS-HARDY, J. The plaintiffs have, in respect of the promenade at Llandudno, by virtue of byelaws approved by the Local Government D Board in 1878, the right of preventing any public address from being delivered, and they took proceedings against the defendant before the magistrates for breach of these byelaws. This action in no way relates to the promenade. Between the foot of the promenade and the commencement of the foreshore is a strip about which I know nothing. The defendant has sometimes delivered addresses from this strip.
But this action in no way relates to this strip. In June, 1898, he applied civilly to E the plaintiffs for permission to hold religious services on the shore. In reply he received the following answer :

"Dear Sir,—Your application for permission to hold religious services on the beach was submitted to my council this afternoon, when I was requested to express regret that they cannot accede thereto, inasmuch as they have granted F a similar privilege to the organisation which has been in the habit of visiting Llandudno in past years, and proposes to come again this season. —Yours truly, Alfred Conolly."

I may observe that the organisation referred to in this letter is not antagonistic to the defendant, and that there is ample space on the extensive shore for more than one service. The defendant has since held services on the shore, until he was G restrained by an interlocutory injunction. The evidence satisfies me that there was no breach of the peace, no disorder worth mentioning, and no inconvenience except of the most trivial kind to any of the public resorting to the shore.

It is, however, contended on the part of the plaintiffs that they are entitled as lessees to the possession of the foreshore, and that the public have no right at common law to enter on the shore, when dry, except for the purposes of navigation H or fishing. I think I am bound by the decision of the majority of the judges of the Court of King's Bench in 1821 in Blundell v. Catterall (1) to hold that, in strict law, this proposition is well founded. The public are not entitled to cross the shore even for purposes of bathing or amusement. The sands on the seashore are not to be regarded as in the full sense of the word a highway. A more extensive right may possibly have been gained by prescription or by custom either by individuals or by I the permanent or temporary inhabitants of Llandudno; but the existence of this more extensive right must be proved, and will not be presumed in the absence of proof. The plaintiffs have, therefore, prima facie a right to treat every bather, every nursemaid with a perambulator, every boy riding a donkey, and every preacher on the shore at Llandudno as a trespasser.

In the present case, there is no evidence from which I can find the existence of a legal usage or custom entitling the defendant to deliver sermons or addresses on the shore at Llandudno. The defendant seems to imagine that his position as a clergy-

A man of the Established Church, bound to preach the Gospel both in season and out of season, gives him some special and peculiar rights. It is needless for me to say that this contention cannot for one moment be maintained. I must treat the defendant precisely as I should treat a Roman Catholic priest, a Methodist preacher, or a Salvation Army captain. This court has nothing to do with the truth or falsehood of the doctrines which the defendant has preached. I feel bound to say that I consider this action wholly unnecessary, and one which ought not to have been brought. It is no part of the duty of the plaintiffs, as lessees from the Crown for an unexpired term of two years, to prevent a harmless user of the shore. There are persons who derive satisfaction from listening to the addresses of the defendant, and the defendant derives satisfaction from delivering these addresses. I cannot conceive why they should be deprived of this innocent pleasure. Nobody is obliged to listen; nobody is molested. This action is an attempt to assert rights which the Crown would never have thought of putting forward, and which are in no way necessary for the peace and good order of the town of Llandudno. Charges have been made against the defendant in the pleadings and in the evidence for which there is no justification. I cannot refuse to make a declaration that the defendant is not entitled without the consent of the plaintiffs to hold meetings or deliver addresses, lectures or sermons on any part of the foreshore in lease from the Crown, but I decline to go further. I decline to grant an injunction. That is a formidable legal weapon which ought to be reserved for less trivial occasions, and I make no order as to costs.

COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), July 29, 1895

Bankruptcy—Mentally disordered person—Liability to be made bankrupt—Right of trustee to take bankrupt's property—Control of court in lunacy.

A person found lunatic by inquisition was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed.

Held: (i) the trustee in bankruptcy could only take the bankrupt's property subject to the powers of the court in lunacy under the Lunacy Act, 1890; (ii) it was the duty of the court to protect the interests of the lunatic, and, in view of the limited amount of his income, the court would order that the property be applied towards his maintenance.

Per LINDLEY, L.J. : A lunatic can be validly adjudicated a bankrupt under the direction of the court in lunacy.

Notes. The Lunacy Act, 1890, was repealed and inquisitions abolished by the Mental Health Act, 1959. For the management by the court of the property and affairs of mental patients see the Mental Health Act, 1959 (39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.), Part 8, p. 964).

Summons taken out by the trustee in the bankruptcy of W. Farnham, a lunatic, asking that certain chattels—chests of silver plate—which had been deposited in court in the lunacy, might be delivered out to the applicant as being property of the bankrupt. The application was opposed by the lunatic's wife, who had been appointed committee of his person and estate. G

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and R. J. Parker for the trustee.

Warmington, Q.C., and S. O. Buckmaster for the wife.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an application by the trustee in bankruptcy of a lunatic, Mr. Farnham, that certain articles of silver plate now deposited in court in this matter may be delivered out to him. The summons raises a question of some little difficulty. Before I allude to the legal aspect of the case I will state shortly those H facts which give rise to the controversy.

In August, 1893, Mr. Farnham was found lunatic by inquisition, and a committee has been appointed. In May, 1894, he was adjudicated bankrupt, the act of bankruptcy being that the sheriff had seized and been in possession for twenty-one days, which is sufficient to constitute an act of bankruptcy under s. 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 [now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (c)]. In March, 1895, the master in lunacy directed the plate which is in question to be brought into court, and on Mar. 28 an order was made in bankruptcy for delivery of that plate to the trustee, subject to the directions of the judge in lunacy. This summons has been taken out in order to obtain the sanction of the judge in lunacy for the delivery up of this plate. The committee of the lunatic is his wife, and at one period she set up a claim to this plate under an alleged gift by her husband to her, which she said was made in December, 1892, or January, 1893. She supported that claim by an I

address on the chests wherein the plate was contained, looks like a gift from the husband to her. But it was pointed out, and she was advised, that, if it was a gift to her, being within two years of his bankruptcy, it was liable to be set aside under
s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see s. 42 of the Act of 1914], and, consequently, she abandoned all claim to that. The point is an important one, and I shall have to B allude to it again presently. It was because she abandoned all claim to the plate as a gift to her that she was advised that she ought, nevertheless, to assert, I do not say her right as committee to it, but to bring before the notice of the Bankruptcy Court the fact that the plate was under the control of the judge in lunacy, and could not be parted with without his order.

C The legal questions which arise are these. First of all, there is the broad question, and it is an important one, whether a person who has been found lunatic by inquisition can be adjudicated a bankrupt at all. That question is by no means so free from difficulty as at first sight appears. There is no doubt whatever that s. 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, applies in terms to all debtors, and all debtors include not only lunatics but infants. But there might be a difficulty in holding that an infant D could be adjudicated a bankrupt under that section, and there may be difficulty in holding that a lunatic could be so adjudicated. It appears that this doubt about the validity of adjudications in bankruptcy against lunatics is a very old one, and has not yet been altogether removed. I do not propose on the present occasion to solve that doubt. If it were necessary to do so, I should like to look a little more closely than I have done into the course that legislation has taken about E lunatics, and into the authorities. But I shall assume, for the purpose of the present decision, that Mr. Farnham has been validly adjudicated a bankrupt, and that his trustee has been validly appointed.

Assuming that, counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy says that everything follows in his favour, and that the court ought to direct this plate to be handed over to the trustee. But it is said, and I think very properly, that inasmuch as this lunatic F was adjudicated a bankrupt some time after he was found a lunatic by inquisition, the trustee in bankruptcy must take the property subject to the powers of the judge in lunacy conferred by the Lunacy Act, 1890. Sections 117 and 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 [see now Mental Health Act, 1959, ss. 102-107], vest in, or confer upon, the judge in lunacy various powers, among others power to apply the estate of a lunatic in discharge of his debts. Although I believe it is perfectly G well settled that a lunatic can be adjudicated a bankrupt under the direction of the committee acting under the order of the judge in lunacy, yet there is a question whether he can be validly adjudicated apart from that direction. Supposing that the trustee takes subject to the statutory powers, the main point in counsel's argument is answered. I think that counsel for the wife was quite right in saying that, whatever may be true of the actual vesting of the property in the trustee, H it does not follow that the trustee may take the property which is so vested in him except subject always to the jurisdiction which has accrued before the bankruptcy to the judge in lunacy under the inquisition. I think that that is a good answer to the argument so far as it goes.

Then counsel for the trustee said: "But this property is not the bankrupt's property at all, and you, the judge in lunacy, have nothing to do with it. It was
I the wife's property. It was settled on the wife, but under s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it was set aside, and then it became vested in the trustee in bankruptcy."
I think that that argument is unsound. In fact, it has been dealt with judicially, and condemned judicially, by CHITTY, J., in Sanguinetti v. Stuckey's Banking Co. (1).
If the settlement is void, that does not mean that the property, the subject of the settlement, vests in the trustee by a title which overrides that of both the donor and the donee. The settlement being void, the property reverts to the donor; and it is as the donor's property that it vests in the trustee in bankruptcy, and must be distributed. That was the view taken by CHITTY, J., of this section in

Sanguinetti's Case (1), and I think that that is right. Therefore the trustee can only take the plate in this case if it is the property of the donor, that is to say, the lunatic. If it is the property of the lunatic, it is subject to the order, disposition, and jurisdiction of the judge in lunacy which had accrued before the adjudication. A

That being so, we look and consider what is the proper mode of exercising the discretion which the court has as regards allowing the property of the lunatic to go to his creditors. It is the province of the court to look after the lunatic and his interests. We are told that in the present case, the state of affairs is such that it will be contrary to the benefit and interests of the lunatic if we allow this property to be distributed among his creditors. We are bound to protect him, and having seen our way to give a sufficient answer, and a proper answer, to all the arguments of the trustee, the conclusion we have arrived at is, that this summons ought to be dismissed. B C

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. One question arises which no doubt is a very important one; that is, whether the lunatic can be adjudicated a bankrupt. At the present moment that it rather in the nature of an open question. There is certainly no direct decision in regard to that. It is a very important matter, and a matter with regard to which I should like to give a great deal more consideration than I have given to it at present before expressing any opinion with regard to it. I propose, therefore, to leave that an open question as it has been left hitherto. But I will, for the purposes of this case, assume that a lunatic can be adjudicated a bankrupt. D

Then arises the point with regard to how far this plate has vested in the trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of the creditors, or whether it is not subject to the disposition of the judge in lunacy. The first and most important question to consider is with regard to certain dates. Mr. Farnham was found a lunatic on Aug. 5, 1893. In November, 1893, judgment and execution were obtained against him. On May 19, 1894, he was adjudicated a bankrupt. But it must be recollected that this adjudication in bankruptcy was after the time when Mr. Farnham was found to be a lunatic, and the consideration arises whether or not the jurisdiction of the court in lunacy does not take effect. There is no doubt, I apprehend, that, subject to what I am about to say, the property of the bankrupt would have vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. But the trustee, in my judgment, took his title subject to the power contained in s. 117 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. The title of the trustee was acquired subsequently to the lunacy; and being acquired subsequently to the lunacy, in my judgment, it cannot be enforced in bankruptcy under s. 1 of the Act of 1890. That being so, in my judgment, this plate is subject to be dealt with by this court according to its discretion. E F G

In favour of the trustee in bankruptcy another point was taken under s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It was said that this property was the property of the wife, and that the gift, as it had been made within two years of the adjudication in bankruptcy, was void as against the trustee. But, if the gift was void, the property became re-vested in the donor, the donor being a lunatic. This point is completely answered by Sanguinetti v. Stuckey's Banking Co. (1). It is said that the trustee in bankruptcy is attempting to set up a settlement which he himself has set aside, that is a thing he cannot do, and, therefore, this property never vested in the trustee in the same way as the other property did, but under s. 117 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, is subject to be disposed of by the judge in lunacy. With that I agree. If that is so, how is it to be dealt with? There is abundance of authority—in point of fact it is, I may say, essential—that the matter that should first be considered in dealing with the property of the lunatic is: What is for his advantage? It appears here that there are very small funds indeed that can be applied to the lunatic's maintenance, and that, without the fund in court, in all probability he will become a pauper. Under those circumstances I am of opinion that it is the duty of this court to have this fund so disposed of that it shall be H I applied towards the maintenance of the lunatic, therefore, that this application should be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not myself satisfied that there can be an adjudication in bankruptcy against a lunatic otherwise than through the judge in lunacy directing the committee, in the name of the lunatic, to commit an act of bankruptcy. There are reasons which show that it is difficult to see how an adjudication in bankruptcy can operate however it is brought about. How can a lunatic commit an act of bankruptcy? That is one question that has to be answered. Again, how can the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy be set up without the consent of the judge in lunacy, as against the jurisdiction and the administration of the judge in lunacy? By the prerogative of the Crown, which has been exercised for centuries through the Commissioners in Lunacy the care of the lunatic, and the disposition of his estate, is vested in the Commissioners in Lunacy. During the centuries in which that jurisdiction has been exercised certain rules have been laid down. Among them is a rule, which appears in the first instance harsh, that, notwithstanding the just claims of creditors, the lunatic must be taken care of first. In other words, the rule is to the effect that the lunatic must have proper maintenance provided for him before the creditors can take a single penny. That is the law as it has been administered by the Commissioners in Lunacy for a very long time indeed.

I do not determine whether there can be an adjudication in bankruptcy against a lunatic. It is a very important one. It has been in doubt, and it will remain in doubt until it is expressly raised in a case which requires its decision. It appears to me that without in the least purporting to decide that there can be an adjudication in bankruptcy against a lunatic, and that there has been such an adjudication in this case—assuming that he committed an act of bankruptcy by allowing goods of his to remain in the hands of the sheriff, and that everything has gone in due order—yet that adjudication cannot in any way oust the jurisdiction of the judge in lunacy, or interfere with any principle which has been established as regards that jurisdiction. So, if there be a reasonable case for doubting that the lunatic could be properly provided for except by applying some portion of this property for his maintenance, that would be a complete answer to this application, subject only to the argument brought forward on behalf of the trustee. I refer to the argument that the plate in question was not the property of the lunatic at all, but that it was the property of his wife, to whom he had given it before the lunacy, and before the bankruptcy, but within two years of the adjudication in bankruptcy. That gift, it has been urged, was perfectly good between husband and wife, but, although it was good as between them, the property of the wife was subject to the bankrupt's debts, and vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. That depends on the proper construction of s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. But the trustee can take nothing under a void settlement. What then is the alternative? It is plain that the Act intended that the property should come to the trustee, not as the property of the beneficiaries under the settlement, but as though the settlement never had existed—that is to say, it passes as the property of the bankrupt, the lunatic. That being so, I think it is perfectly plain that the jurisdiction of the judges in lunacy over all this property exists, and cannot be ousted by an adjudication in bankruptcy, even if it be properly made. Therefore, the ground of the application fails, and the application should be dismissed with costs.

Re HALE. LILLEY v. FOAD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Sir Francis Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.), May 31, 1899]

Limitation of Action—Mortgage—Charge on business—Power of mortgagee to appoint receiver and manager—Receiver appointed on death of mortgagor—Part payment of debt incurred by mortgagor—Acknowledgment

H. created a charge on a business to secure payment of an annuity, and by a deed made in 1886 gave the annuitant the powers of a mortgagee under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, including the power to appoint a receiver of the business. The deed expressly provided that, in extension of the powers of a receiver under that Act, any receiver appointed, if so directed by the mortgagee, should be at liberty to manage and carry on the business as he thought fit. After the date of the deed H. incurred with the plaintiff a trade debt which he verbally agreed to pay off by monthly instalments. Down to his death in June, 1891, H. paid the instalments as arranged, but part of the debt remained unpaid at the date of his death. By his will H. appointed the defendant his executrix. By a document dated July 29, 1891, the mortgagee, pursuant to the deed of 1886, appointed J. receiver of the business "with full power to manage and carry on the same as he may think fit." On Aug. 6, 1891, while acting as receiver, J. paid the plaintiff a further monthly instalment of his debt. On July 3, 1897, more than six years after the last payment made by H., the plaintiff began proceedings to recover the remainder of the debt from H.'s estate.

Held: having regard to the extension of the powers of the receiver to include the power to manage and carry on the business, J. (who was the agent of the mortgagor, and, therefore, of the defendant) had acted within the scope of his authority in paying the instalment; the payment, being unconditional, raised the inference of a fresh promise to pay the remainder of the debt which was binding on the defendant; and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Appeal from an order of BYRNE, J., on an originating summons taken out by the plaintiff, J. E. Lilley, against the executrix of F. W. Hale, deceased, claiming to be a creditor of the deceased and asking on behalf of himself and all other creditors for administration of the testator's real and personal estate.

The summons was adjourned from chambers into the witness list for the trial of two issues: (i) Whether there was a debt due to the plaintiff; (ii) if there was a debt, whether it was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The facts were as follows:—By virtue of an indenture dated Dec. 13, 1886, F. W. Hale was interested in a business of manufacturing and vending proprietary herbal remedies or patent medicines. The deed recited that Jennette von Swartwout was the owner for her separate use of a life interest in the business, and that N. E. Hale was the owner for her separate use of the reversionary interest in the same business after the death of Mrs. von Swartwout. The parties to the deed agreed that the business should thereafter be considered as belonging to F. W. Hale during the lifetime of Mrs. von Swartwout, and after her death to N. E. Hale, subject and charged “With an annual sum of £520, payable without any deduction, except property tax (if any), during a period of five years from the date of these presents to the said Jennette von Swartwout, her executors, administrators, or assigns (whether she shall survive for that period or not), by equal weekly payments of £10. . . .”

By cl. 7 of the deed it was provided that:

“In case at any time the said annuity shall fall into arrear to the amount of four weeks' instalments, or in case the said F. W. Hale or N. E. Hale shall sell, dispose of, or incumber the business or any portion thereof (except as hereinafter provided), it shall be lawful for the said Jennette von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, to enter into possession of the business, and henceforth hold, manage, and carry on the same for her own benefit, and the said F. W. Hale and N. E. Hale, their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, shall therefrom, at his, her, or their own cost, assign the business to the said J. von Swartwout, subject nevertheless to the proviso for redemption hereinafter contained. . . .”

By cl. 9 it was provided that:

“In case the said J. von Swartwout shall at any time become entitled to enter into possession of the business as aforesaid, the powers conferred by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, upon a mortgagee when the mortgage money has become due shall, so far as the same are applicable to the terms and conditions of these present, thereupon become exercisable, and it shall be lawful for the said Jennette von Swartwout, either herself or by her agents or attorney, in lieu of taking possession or before or after taking possession of the business, to exercise the power of appointing a receiver conferred by the said Act, and by way of extension of the provisions of the said Act it is hereby also agreed that any receiver appointed under the said power in that behalf shall be at liberty, if so directed in writing by the said Jennette von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, to manage and carry on the business as he may think fit, and that any moneys he or the said Jennette von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, may pay or expend for that purpose, and whether before or subsequent to redemption by the said Frederick Walter Hale or other the person or persons entitled to the business as aforesaid, shall be considered a charge upon the business with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum." A

After the date of this deed F. W. Hale continued to carry on the business, and became indebted to the plaintiff Lilley for the cost of printing almanacs circulated in connection with the business. In October, 1888, the amount of the debt being B £1,000, Hale entered into a verbal arrangement with Lilley for payment of the amount by monthly instalments of £25. Hale died on June 16, 1891, having reduced the debt to £444. By his will he appointed Miss Foad, the defendant, and Mr. Richardson (the manager of his business) executrix and executor, and gave all his property to Miss Foad absolutely.

On July 1, 1891, Miss Foad alone proved the will, Richardson renouncing probate. C On July 29, 1891, Mrs. von Swartwout, whose annuity had been in arrear for more than two years, elected to exercise her power of appointing a receiver, and, by a document under her hand referring to the deed of Dec. 13, 1886, appointed one in these terms :

"I hereby in virtue of the powers vested in me for that purpose by the said agreement appoint Frederick Johnson . . . a receiver of the said business, with full power to manage and carry on the same as he may think fit, but subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in the said agreement, and I further direct that the said F. Johnson shall be entitled to be paid at the rate of 5 per cent. on the gross amount of all moneys to be received by him as such receiver as aforesaid until I may think fit to vary such remuneration." D

In pursuance of this appointment Johnson assumed the management of the business. On Aug. 6, 1891, Johnson paid by cheque the instalment of Lilley's debt. Further instalments were paid by Lewis (who was employed by Johnson in the management of the business) on Sept. 1 and Oct. 2 following. E

In October the annuitant appointed a fresh receiver in place of Johnson, and no further instalments of Lilley's debt were paid. F

On Mar. 12, 1898, an order was made for the administration of Hale's personal estate on an originating summons which had been taken out on Jan. 17, 1892, by an admitted creditor of Hale. It was agreed between the parties at the trial of the issues that Lilley's claim should be treated as made in that administration. More than six years had elapsed between the dates of the last payment of an instalment by Hale and of the plaintiff's summons, but it was admitted that the payments made since Hale's death might take the debt out of the statute. G

BYRNE, J., held that the powers of the receiver under the indenture of Dec. 13, 1886, being greater than those conferred by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, in protecting the assets of the business, he had properly paid the instalment to Lilley; that in making the payment he was acting as the agent of the executrix; that as there were no circumstances in the case to prevent the ordinary presumption which arises from an unconditional payment, viz., that a new promise to pay is implied, the Statute of Limitations only commenced to run against Lilley from the date of such payment, and that the debt of Lilley was not statute-barred. From that decision the executor appealed. H

Astbury, Q.C., and Montague Lush for the executor. I

Eve, Q.C., and Younger for the plaintiff, were not called on to argue.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—This case has been extremely well argued, and the difficulty, such as it is, has been put forward clearly. The question has some novelty in it, and it requires careful consideration. It is whether payments made by Johnson, the receiver and manager to the plaintiff, who was an undoubted creditor of Hale, of monthly instalments of £25 on account of his debt are sufficient

A to enable the plaintiff, who would otherwise be barred under the statute of James I, to prove for the balance of his debt against Hale's estate.

B It is all important to ascertain Johnson's authority. That was conferred by Hale under the deed of Dec. 13, 1886. Hale owed the plaintiff a trade debt. This debt was unsecured, and it was agreed that Hale should pay off that debt by instalments of £25 a month, and down to June, 1891, he did pay the instalments as arranged. In that month he died, and the defendant, Miss Foad, became his executrix. She was in this position: She could, of course, pay off the debt owing under the deed of Dec. 13, 1886, but if she did not pay it off, she was bound by the stipulations which Hale had made in that deed, and, whether she liked it or not, the receiver appointed by the mortgagee would become her agent to the extent of the assets of her testator at the time. That would be her true legal position. Hale's death did not operate as a revocation of the power to appoint a receiver conferred on the mortgagee. She could not help herself if she followed the obligations of the testator. Let us see what happened.

D We must turn now to the power to appoint a receiver. To my mind, the authority of the receiver is all important. It is at the root of the whole case. I very much doubt whether it would be right to decide this case in favour of the plaintiff if no power was given to the receiver to act, except in accordance with the power given by s. 24 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 [see now the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 109] because, although it is quite true that a receiver under that Act is the agent of the mortgagor and not of the mortgagee, the Act provides in that section what he is to do with moneys coming to his hands, and among the matters enumerated there is not any power to pay off a debt which does not affect the mortgaged property. I very much doubt whether a receiver under the Act could pay off an unsecured debt. He could keep down the interest on the mortgage debt, and so on, but I should feel a difficulty with regard to this unsecured debt if the deed contained nothing more than a power for the mortgagee to appoint a receiver under the Act. But the deed of December, 1886, does not stop there. It extends that, and the receiver appointed under the power is to be at liberty, if so directed by the mortgagee, "to manage and carry on the business as he may think fit." He is not only to be receiver under the Act of 1881, but also to manage and carry on the business as he thinks fit. The mortgagee, having the power in her hands of appointing a receiver and manager, did, by the document of July 29, 1891, appoint Johnson receiver of the business, "with full power to manage and carry on the same as he may think fit."

G I think that BYRNE, J., was perfectly warranted in calling attention to that extension of the power of the receiver, and this extension is all important. Johnson's position was this. Hale had died, and Miss Foad was his executrix, but that did not affect the powers of the mortgage deed, for Miss Foad could not help herself, and Johnson was appointed by the mortgagee to be receiver, and to manage this business. What does he do? He is informed of this business debt, an old one, and still outstanding, and one for the payment of which Hale had in his lifetime made some promise, and he goes on paying it in the manner arranged. Can it be said that in doing that Johnson was exceeding his authority? I do not think he was exceeding it. He had authority to go on paying the debt by instalments as he did, and he was to do that by the authority of the executrix. She did not herself give that authority, but her testator had given it, and that bound her. There was, I think, ample authority for Johnson to pay the debt by instalments.

I Then comes the question, what was the legal effect of his making these payments? In respect of what were they payments? He made them knowing perfectly well that there was a balance still owing of the original debt, and he paid the instalments in respect of that. Can it be said that he had no authority even to make a promise that the assets of the testator should be liable in future for the instalments, and that the balance of the debt should be paid out of those assets? I think that he had. It seems to me no stretch of his authority at all. In my opinion, an agent has authority to make a promise to pay part of a debt, and if he makes a payment on account of it, and nothing more is said or done, that payment is good, and any jury would draw from it the inference of a promise to pay the remainder of the debt. The authority to promise, in my opinion, exists, and it appears to me to have been pursued in this case. That is the key to the whole matter. If the case turned only on the powers under s. 24 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, I might have felt great doubt about it, but as it turns upon the larger powers conferred by the deed, I feel none. In my opinion BYRNE, J., was quite right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I agree with the judgment that has just been delivered, and I agree that the whole question in the case, and the only one, is what was the authority of Johnson? A promise need not be made by the debtor himself; it is enough if it is made by an agent or a person representing him. To take the common case of an executor, if he makes a promise of this kind by making part payment, either personally or by his agent, there is no doubt that he binds the estate to pay the remainder of the debt, because it is his duty to pay his testator's debts. In the same way, in the case of a receiver. Chinnery v. Evans (1) does appear to me to go so far as to show that a receiver acting within the scope of his authority and dealing with a matter within the mortgage, can bar the operation of the statute by part payment of interest on the mortgage debt. The reason is that he is acting within the scope of his authority. The question, therefore, comes back to this, whether the receiver in the present case was acting within the scope of his authority.

I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said as to the importance of the terms of the power under which the receiver was appointed. I also agree that there is a difficulty in seeing how, having regard to the provisions of sub-s. (8) of s. 24 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and the mode in which money coming to the hands of a receiver is to be dealt with, a payment of this kind could be properly made by him. It is difficult, I will only say, to see how any receiver appointed under that Act could conduct a business and deal with the assets in the way in which the receiver has done here, because the sub-sections of s. 24 seem to refer to the different duties of a person appointed to receive money, not of a person appointed to carry on a business, while here there is a person who has been expressly empowered to carry on a business, and whose duty it is to carry it on. If we get as far as that, we find, in my opinion, that it was the duty of the receiver to do what this receiver has done. He had power to pay debts connected with the business, and it is not shown that this was not a debt connected with Hale's business. At any rate, it was clearly one which Hale was paying off by instalments, and the receiver thought it was part of his duty to pay it off in the same way. There was good reason for its being paid in that way, and I am far from saying that it was not in the interest of Hale's business that the debt should be so paid, because the payment by monthly instalments of £25 each prevented the creditor from coming down on the assets for the whole sum at once, which might have been disastrous. It was, in my opinion, in accordance with the duty of the receiver in managing the business to pay this debt as he did.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that BYRNE, J., was perfectly right in finding, as he did, that this receiver in making these payments was acting properly —i.e., within the scope of his authority. Thus the difficulty in the case vanishes. We cannot distinguish between a payment and a payment from which a promise is to be inferred, as it is a legal inference. Payment of part of a debt is an acknowledgment that it is part of a debt which has to be paid, and it seems to me to be quite impossible to draw any distinction between the payment as a payment and the payment as an act from which the legal inference of a promise to pay the whole debt flows, when once we have got the fact that the payment was within the duty of the receiver. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

A ROMER, L.J.—I also think that by virtue of the powers conferred by the deed under which the receiver was appointed he had power on behalf of his principal, the mortgagor, to pay the instalment of £25 on Aug. 6, 1891, as also the two subsequent instalments which he seems to have also paid in the same way, and the legal result of that payment is the same as if it had been made by the executrix herself. He was, in my opinion, authorised to make these payments in such a way as to acknowledge that the balance of the debt was due from Hale's estate and should be paid. Therefore the payments that he made were duly and properly made, and take the case out of the Statute of Limitations.

DUNN v. REGEM

E [Reported [1896] 1 Q.B. 116; 65 L.J.Q.B. 279; 73 L.T. 695; 60 J.P. 117; 44 W.R. 243; 12 T.L.R. 101; 40 Sol. Jo. 129]

Crown—Crown servant—Dismissal—Persons employed in public service of the Crown, whether in military or civil capacity, hold appointment at pleasure of Crown—Civil servant appointed for three years certain dismissed before expiry of three years—Crown not bound by terms of appointment and dismissal valid.

F All persons employed in the public service of the Crown, whether in a military or civil capacity, hold their appointments at the pleasure of the Crown, unless there is some statutory provision to the contrary.

The petitioner was appointed a vice-consul in the Niger Protectorate under a contract, made with the consul-general for the protectorate, providing that the petitioner was to be engaged for three years certain. Before the three years had expired the consul-general gave the petitioner notice determining his services.

Held: the Crown was entitled to dismiss the petitioner at pleasure notwithstanding the terms of the contract, and the appointment had, therefore, been properly determined.

H Principle laid down by LORD WATSON in De Dohse v. R. (1) (1886), 66 L.J.Q.B. at p. 423, applied.

Appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial of a petition of right before DAY, J., with a jury who found, on the ground that a person in the public service of the Crown could be dismissed at the will of the Crown, that the petitioner's appointment as a civil servant had been properly determined.

The facts as stated in the petition were that on Jan. 29, 1892, the petitioner entered the service of Her Majesty's Niger Coast Protectorate under a contract made with him by the commissioner and consul-general for the protectorate, Sir Claude Macdonald. The contract provided that the petitioner was to be engaged for a period of three years certain at a salary of £200 in the first year, increasing by £50 a year to £300. The petitioner served in the protectorate from Jan. 29, 1892, until June, 1893, when he came home on leave of absence duly given, and he alleged that during that period he performed his duties under the contract diligently and faithfully. On Oct. 9, 1893, he received a notice purporting to determine his contract in the following terms: "I am directed by Sir Claude Macdonald . . . to inform you that your services are no longer required. You will receive pay up to and for Dec. 16, the date your leave terminates. . . ." The petitioner contended that the notice was given in breach of the contract, and that he remained ready and willing to perform the contract.

W. H. Stevenson for the petitioner.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.) and E. Sutton for the Crown.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question which has been suggested as to an order given for the supply of goods for the public service we will reserve for consideration when that question arises for decision. In this case a relationship was instituted between the petitioner and the Crown in respect of the public service, and that relationship was that the petitioner should become a servant of the Crown and be paid a salary. He became a servant of the Crown in the public service. In this case that has happened which I thought would one day have to be decided upon by the courts. These are the words which I used in De Dohse v. R. (1) :

" . . . the petition of right is founded on the assumption that the suppliant was engaged by persons who had authority to engage him on behalf of her Majesty to serve her Majesty for seven years, that the persons who made the engagement had authority to do so, and that he was dismissed from the engagement. . . It was admitted in argument that if the engagement was for military service, whether as an officer or as a private soldier, for seven years, it would be contrary to public policy—that the Crown could not make a contract for seven years for military service; but it was contended that the engagement in the present case was not an engagement for military service. It is not necessary in the present case to determine whether the doctrine with regard to engagements by the Crown is confined to military service or not. For myself I take leave to say that I do not accept at all that the doctrine is confined to military service under the Crown. All service under the Crown itself is public service, and to my mind it is most likely that the doctrine applies to all public service under the Crown, because all such service is for the public benefit, and therefore it may be that the Crown has despotic authority to get rid of servants who are employed for public purposes and for the benefit and advantage of the public. But it is not necessary to decide this on the present occasion, because to my mind it is clear on the petition of the suppliant that what was proposed to him, if anything, was military service."

That is what I said would probably be the decision of the court. Now it is only necessary to say positively that that is the doctrine of law. That proposition was before the House of Lords, on the appeal in that case, and LORD WATSON seems to have said that it was the correct opinion, and that it must be so decided. LORD WATSON said (66 L.J.Q.B. at p. 423):

"In the first place, it appears to me that no concluded contract is disclosed in the statements contained in this petition of right; and in the second place, I am of opinion that such a concluded contract, if it had been made, must have been held to have imported into it the condition that the Crown has the power to dismiss. Further, I am of opinion that, if any authority representing the Crown were to exclude such a power by express stipulation, that would be a violation of the public policy of the country, and could not derogate from the power of the Crown."

That is conclusive, and I take that to be the rule laid down by the House of Lords, in consonance with the opinion expressed by myself. I think also that Shenton v. Smith (2), in the Privy Council, is equally decisive, though the rule is not so clearly laid down as by LORD WATSON in De Dohse v. R. (1). I think, however, that the Privy Council meant to express the same doctrine as LORD WATSON. Both authority and principle support the doctrine laid down by LORD WATSON. This appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The petitioner was appointed by Sir Claude Macdonald as a vice-consular officer in the Niger Protectorate, and as such to be a servant of the Crown. The question is, whether he can maintain a petition of right because his appointment was determined. It is said that he was engaged for three years certain, and that there was no right to determine his services before the expiration of three years. Persons employed in the public service of the Crown are, unless there is some statutory provision for a higher tenure, ordinarily engaged to hold office during the pleasure of the Crown. When, therefore, the petitioner was appointed by Sir Claude Macdonald, even if he was expressly appointed for three years, yet there was the implied right of the Crown, as in all cases, to end the appointment at pleasure. Here there is no evidence that Sir Claude Macdonald had any authority to employ the petitioner on any other than the usual terms, even if that question were material. Considerations of public interest led to such being the terms of employment in the public service. It has been pointed out in the cases that the appointments are made for the public good, and that it is essential for the public good to be able to determine the appointments at pleasure, except in cases where, for the public good, it has been determined that some other tenure is better. This appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—The petitioner asserts that he was engaged for three years. The question is, whether that prevents the Crown from exercising its ordinary right to dismiss at pleasure. The appointment of Sir Claude Macdonald was to hold at the pleasure of the Crown, and it would be strange if he had power to bind the Crown by an appointment for three years. The general principle is satisfactorily established by the cases. Some of the cases relate to military service, and it has been argued that different considerations apply in such cases, it being in such cases for the advantage of the Crown to have such power, but that such considerations do not apply in the case of a civil servant. I do not agree with that argument. It might be even more detrimental to the interests of the country if the Crown had not that power in the case of a civil servant. The same reasons are quite as strong in the one case as in the other. The authorities are clear upon the question. Besides there is De Dohse v. R. (1), in the House of Lords, where the rule was not confined to the military service. There is also Shenton v. Smith (2), in the Privy Council, which was the case of a civil servant, and it was held that his appointment was at the pleasure of the Crown, and that he was subject to dismissal at the will of the Crown. In my opinion, no person in the position of Sir Claude Macdonald can have power to bind the Crown by engaging any person in the public service for a fixed period.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Winding-up—Lease—Leasehold premises retained by liquidator—Right of lessor to enter claim for company's obligations under unexpired term of lease.

A banking company were lessees under a lease for fourteen years which contained an option to the lessees to determine the lease at the end of the seventh year provided that they had paid the rent due down to the date of determination. Before the first seven years had expired the company was wound-up by the court. The Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, did not provide for disclaimer of a lease by a liquidator, and the lessors refused to accept a surrender of the lease from him. Accordingly, the company, through the liquidator, remained in beneficial occupation of the demised premises.

Held: the lessors were entitled to prove in the winding-up, not only for the rent accrued due, but also to enter a claim for the whole of the company's obligations under the lease for the unexpired term of fourteen years.

Notes. As to application of bankruptcy rules in winding-up of insolvent companies, see now s. 317 of the Companies Act, 1948 (3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 698).

Summons taken out by Hong Kong Land Investment and Agency Co., Ltd. (hereafter called "the land company") asking for an order that the liquidator of the New Oriental Bank Corpn., Ltd. (hereafter called "the bank") be directed to pay out of the bank's assets 7,482 dollars being the amount of the land company's claim, admitted by the liquidator, in respect of rent of premises demised by the land company to the bank; alternatively, that the land company be admitted to rank as ordinary creditors of the bank for 74,212 dollars, being the full amount of the land company's claim under the lease of the premises, and that the liquidator be directed to pay the land company out of the bank's assets the equivalent of the dividends already declared and paid on the debts of the bank, and such future dividends as might be declared thereon.

F The bank was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, with a registered office in England, and a branch office at Victoria in the colony of Hong Kong. By lease dated Oct. 25, 1890, made between the land company and the bank, the land company demised to the bank premises at Victoria, Hong Kong, for the term of fourteen years, from April 1, 1890, at the yearly rent of 6,600 dollars payable by equal monthly payments of 550 dollars. The lease contained a covenant by the bank to pay the rent as therein provided, and a proviso for re-entry in the event of the rent being in arrear for twenty-eight days or of the breach of any of the lessee's covenants therein contained and also a proviso that the bank might at the end of the seventh year of the term determine the lease on giving to the land company

H "at least six calendar months' notice in writing prior to the determination of the said seventh year of their intention so to do, and paying the rent, and performing and observing the covenants by the lessees therein contained up to the date of the term being so determined."

By a second lease of the same date, made between the bank and the land company, the bank sublet to the land company part of the premises comprised in the bank's lease for the term of five years from April 1, 1890, at the yearly rent of 1,800 dollars payable by equal monthly payments of 150 dollars. The bank and the land company entered into possession of the premises under their respective leases, and down to May, 1892, the bank paid to the land company in each month the sum of 452 dollars, being the difference between the rent, rates, and taxes payable by the bank and the land company under their respective leases. On June 23, 1892, the bank passed an extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding-up, and appointed a liquidator, and an order was subsequently made by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., continuing the winding-up under the supervision of the court. The liquidator remained in possession of the premises, and paid the monthly rent of 452 dollars down to October, 1893, and on Oct. 13 he gave up possession, and handed the keys of the premises to the secretary of the land company, which were received by him without prejudice to the rights of the land company.

The bank claimed to be paid the sum of 7,482 dollars in full as a condition precedent to the right of the bank to determine the lease on Mar. 31, 1897, the end of the seventh year, or (in the alternative) to rank as ordinary creditors of the bank for 74,212 dollars in respect of the loss of rental and taxes from Nov. 1, 1893, to Mar. 31, 1904 (the end of the term of the bank's lease).

Buckley, Q.C., and W. E. Capron for the land company.—Where at the commencement of a liquidation a company is lessee of premises for an unexpired term of years the lessor is entitled to the whole of the rent for the unexpired term. Here the lease is for an unexpired term of fourteen years, determinable at the end of the first seven years on payment of the full rent up to that time. It is a condition precedent, therefore, to the liquidator availing himself of that option, that he should pay the rent in full. If he does not do so, the bank will be liable for the rent for the whole period of fourteen years. The land company is, therefore, entitled to prove for the amount of the rent actually due, and to enter a claim for the value of the future rent and for possible breaches, and as each instalment of rent falls due the land company will be entitled to call on the liquidator to pay a dividend thereon equal to that paid by him to the other creditors. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—If the rule in Re Haytor Granite Co. (2) be correct, it differs from the rule in bankruptcy. It is wrong that the rights of the parties should depend on the mode of administration.] The reason for the difference in the rules is, that in bankruptcy a lease vests in the trustee, whereas in the liquidation of a company the lease does not vest in the liquidator, but remains in the company. Here the liquidator, by remaining in possession of the premises, has taken advantage of the lease, and the lease is therefore binding on him.

R. J. Parker for the liquidator.—The only question in this case is as to the principle on which the damage in respect of future rent is to be estimated. The amount payable depends on the amount which the bank ought to be called on to pay for liberty to surrender the lease, and that cannot be affected by the proviso in the lease. In any case, I submit that amount cannot exceed seven years' rent. As regards future rents, a lessor is in a position analogous to that of a secured creditor. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—My difficulty in this case is that the liquidator has not disclaimed the lease.] There is no provision in the Companies Acts enabling him to do so. The liquidator has sent back the keys and done all in his power to determine the lease. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think I ought to allow proof without regard to the proviso for determination at the end of the seven years, because the liquidator is not in a position to avail himself of it.] Under the earlier cases it was decided that the claims of a lessor in respect of future rent were incapable of being estimated, and consequently could not be proved for. It has now, however, been held in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) that such claims can now be estimated and proved for, and the earlier cases can therefore no longer be regarded as law. The land company must therefore value their claims and prove for them. Assuming, therefore, that Hardy v. Fothergill (1) decides that the principle on which such claims are to be estimated is as shown by Re McEwan, Ex parte Blake. The damage for which the land company is entitled to prove is, I submit, the amount of rent the bank would have had to pay in order to enable them to determine the lease at the end of the seven years, viz., 7,480 dollars, and for this the land company is entitled to prove. They, however, contend, on the authority of Re Haytor Granite Co. (2) and Re London and Colonial Co. (3), that they are entitled to prove for the rent due and to enter a contingent claim for the full amount of the future rent. These cases, however, I submit, have been overruled by Hardy v. Fothergill (1), and this appears to have been the opinion of LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Midland Coal,

A Coke and Iron Co., Craig's Claim (4), although the point was left open. It is true that s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875 [replaced by s. 317 of Companies Act, 1948] introduces the bankruptcy rules of proof in the case of insolvent companies only. But here there can be no doubt but that the company is insolvent, and Hardy v. Fothergill (1) consequently applies. Further, the company being insolvent, no order can be made for impounding the assets to answer claims or for restraining the dissolution of the company.

B Buckley, Q.C., in reply.—Assuming that Hardy v. Fothergill (1) applies, the land company would be entitled to prove for the whole amount of the periodical payments extending over the fourteen years. Re McEwan, Ex parte Blake, does not apply because it was a bankruptcy case, and the trustee had, therefore, a right to disclaim. All that was decided in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) was that the future and contingent liability of an assignee of a lease under his covenant to indemnify was capable of valuation and proof. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—That decision does not touch the case of a proof by a lessor on the bankruptcy of his lessee in respect of his claim under a subsisting lease. There the lease was at an end. It only decided that a lessee could make no claim against his bankrupt assignee for payments made by such lessee on the ground that, as such assignee had been bankrupt, the contingent claims of the lessee ought to have been proved for in such bankruptcy. A lessor must come in at once and prove in the bankruptcy or forgo his claim in a case where the lease is not a subsisting one. The case did not decide that, without more, there is a right to prove in the liquidation of a company for all the future rents at once. It was a decision in bankruptcy, where the question could have given no trouble. In the case, however, of a company which is never dissolved but remains in the company.] The applicants are, I submit, entitled to have a claim entered for the full amount of the rent which will become due under the lease, and to prevent the bank from being dissolved without notice to them: (LINDLEY ON COMPANIES (5th Edn.) p. 731).

F VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In Re Midland Coal, Coke and Iron Co., Craig's Claim (4) LINDLEY, L.J., intimates that Hardy v. Fothergill (1) makes a difference in the right of proof in the case of companies. What is a lessor's right of proof in respect of an unexpired term of years at the date of the commencement of the liquidation? If the lease is still subsisting, how can he prove immediately? He cannot have both the rent and possession. What right can he have to re-enter and have the premises again? There must be a surrender or an accepted liquidation of the lease. Then it would be the same thing as in bankruptcy. In fact, unless there is a disclaimer, I do not see how Hardy v. Fothergill (1) can apply. As the liquidator will not accept the terms offered by the land company, I cannot make him do so. I must therefore deal with the matter on the basis of there being a subsisting lease. The land company's rights will be those under the old cases, which are rightly contended to be good law. I cannot make the bank say they will give up the premises at the end of the seven years. All that I can do is to allow a proof for breaches of the lease up to the present time. According to my view, if the company in liquidation remain in beneficial occupation of the lease and premises, that is, if they are occupying and get the benefit of the lease, or get the rents and thus get the benefit of the lease, I shall do my very best to make them pay rent and not a dividend. If people get the benefit of premises after the liquidation has commenced they must pay the rent. In my opinion, the principle of Re Haytor Granite Co. (2) and Re London and Colonial Co., Horsey's Claim (3) applies to this case, but if the bank are in beneficial occupation, I go further and say that the land company can enter a claim for the full rent. The reasonable thing is that the bank should surrender the lease at once and allow the land company to prove for the rent on the basis of that surrender. As, however, the land company decline to accept a surrender of the lease, I direct that they shall be at liberty to prove for the rent actually due and to enter a contingent claim for the present value of the future rent and obligations in the lease, following Re Haytor Granite Co. (2) and Re London and Colonial Co., Horsey's Claim (3). The land company must bear their own costs, and the liquidator will take his out of the assets of the bank.

Magistrates—Bias—Justice belonging to class for whose benefit proceedings taken—Summons against unlicensed river pilot heard and determined by justice who was licensed pilot.

C., an unlicensed pilot, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction under s. 361 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 [now s. 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act, 1913], of having continued in charge of a ship after a qualified pilot had offered to take charge of her. M., one of the six justices who sat to hear and determine the case, was a duly qualified pilot and licensed for the same pilotage district, but for more than forty years he had been a "choice" pilot, that is, a pilot chosen and engaged beforehand by shipowners, and for the last nineteen years he had been, and was at the date of the conviction, in the service of a large steamship company who were entitled to his exclusive services and never employed unlicensed pilots.

Held: as M. belonged to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection against unlicensed pilots the proceedings were taken, there was a reasonable apprehension of bias which disqualified him from sitting, and, therefore, the conviction was bad.

Rule Nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up to be quashed a conviction by justices for the borough of Gravesend on the ground that one of them, Thomas Martin, had an interest in the subject-matter of the conviction.

On Oct. 10, 1894, the applicant for the rule, Thomas James Clancy, appeared before the justices on a summons taken out by one William Larkins alleging that Clancy, being an unlicensed pilot, unlawfully assumed and continued in charge of a ship on the river Thames after Larkins, a qualified pilot, had, to Clancy's knowledge, offered to take charge of the ship, contrary to s. 361 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 [now s. 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act, 1913]. Clancy was convicted. After his conviction it came to his knowledge that one of the six justices who heard and determined the case was Thomas Martin, a Trinity House pilot licensed to take ships down the Thames to Gravesend, and that at the time of the hearing and determination Martin was actively engaged as a pilot at Gravesend and in the London pilotage district. Clancy obtained a rule for certiorari on the ground that Martin, being a licensed pilot, was in competition with unlicensed pilots, and, therefore, had a pecuniary interest in the result of the conviction and a substantial bias against the accused so as to disqualify him for sitting to hear and determine the summons.

Martin filed an affidavit stating that he never had, and had not now any interest whatever in the conviction of Clancy; that although he was a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, he did not in any way compete with Clancy, or any other unlicensed pilot; that the only licensed pilots who in any way competed with Clancy were those licensed pilots who took "turns" at a pilot station, and that he did not and never had taken any part in the "turn" system; that for forty-three years he had been a licensed "choice" pilot (that is, a pilot chosen and regularly engaged beforehand by shipowners to pilot their ships); that for nineteen years last past he had acted as a "choice" pilot for the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. only; that for five years last past he had acted as pilot on the outward voyages only of the ships of the said company; that he went on board the said ships at Gravesend on the days appointed for sailing, and his licence entitled him to pilot the ships as far as the Isle of Wight; that the ships of the said company never employed unlicensed pilots, but employed "choice" licensed pilots only, and that Mr. Clancy could not, therefore, have competed with him in his employment as pilot of the ships of the company; that under the terms of his engagement with the company, the company were exclusively entitled to his services as pilot, and that he was not entitled to offer his services as pilot to any other employer so long as his engagement continues, and that, therefore, he could not compete with Mr. Clancy in acting as pilot of ships other than those of the company; that in becoming party to the conviction he was not in any way influenced by favour or prejudice for or against the accused or the class of pilots of which he was one, but acted solely on the evidence before him, and that the justices were unanimous in convicting Mr. Clancy.

WILLS, J.—This is a case of some difficulty, because, as in all such cases, it is difficult to keep separate the different questions of interest, bias, and the risk of bias. Undoubtedly in some of the decisions on this subject there has been confusion in the terms used in cases where the disqualification is pecuniary interest, and in cases where the disqualification is bias. Again, there are other cases where the objection was not so much on the ground of bias, as on the ground that the same person cannot act as prosecutor and judge. There have been other cases in which the tribunal giving the decision was not properly speaking a judicial body, but was acting in such a way that, although it was not a judicial body, its proceedings were contrary to natural justice, and upon that ground the decision was not allowed to stand. In each one of these qualifying circumstances the considerations are not identical, and unless this is clearly kept in mind we may be led astray by expressions perfectly right with regard to certain states of facts, but incorrect with regard to such a case as this.

In the present case the facts which seem to be important are those relating to the question of bias, because the point as to pecuniary interest is out of the question. The point, then, we have to decide is whether there was bias, that is, actual bias, or a reasonable risk of bias—such a reasonable apprehension of bias as a man might justly entertain; and we have also to consider what the result would be in the future if similar things were allowed to be done in similar circumstances. I do not myself for a moment attribute to Mr. Martin that he was subject to actual bias. There are no facts stated in the affidavits upon which we could come to that conclusion. But at the same time he does belong to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection against unlicensed pilots these proceedings were taken. That seems to me to be the important point here, namely, that Mr. Martin belongs to a small class of privileged persons whose privileges were being interfered with by Clancy. I cannot help thinking that under such circumstances the result is not satisfactory, and in the interests of the administration of justice this conviction ought not to be allowed to stand.

It is important in the administration of justice by magistrates, who now have so many jurisdictions to exercise, that such administration should be free not only from any interference by motives which ought not to influence judicial tribunals, but also from any appearance of conduct which might give reasonable apprehension of such motives. If such reasonable apprehension became general it might seriously interfere with the administration of justice, and impair the confidence which the public ought to have in such administration. Suppose, as has been very properly put by my brother WRIGHT during the argument, that all the justices had been licensed pilots, or that all had been unlicensed pilots, could anyone say that it would have been a proper tribunal to try such a case as this. There can be only one answer to that question, and the same principle applies here where one only of the justices was a licensed pilot. Without attributing to Mr. Martin anything approaching to misconduct, or anything more than a mistake which was natural under the circumstances, as no objection was made to him, I think there is enough in this case to justify us in saying that the constitution of the bench was not such as it ought to have been, and the key-note of my judgment therefore is that this gentleman belonged to a small class for whose benefit these proceedings were taken.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. Counsel showing cause has referred to cases where this court has been asked to interfere on somewhat similar grounds with the proceedings of administrative bodies—not courts of justice, but administrative bodies such as the county council, or the college of physicians. But there is a real difference between the two cases. We ought to be very slow indeed to interfere with those outside bodies, unless something really wrong has been done; but not so with regard to inferior courts. With regard to them we ought to act on slighter grounds than in the case of administrative bodies.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), December 13, 1895]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Quiet enjoyment—Flats—Implied letting scheme—Flat in building used for residential flats let to plaintiff—Letting agreement on printed form applicable to other flats—Regulations annexed to agreement containing scheme of management of flats—Nuisance by landlord—Conversion begun of building into club.

By an agreement made in February, 1895, the defendant let to the plaintiff five rooms comprising a flat in a building which at the date of the agreement was used for residential flats and had been so used since it was erected. The agreement was on a printed form which did not apply to the plaintiff's flat alone, and on which the names of the parties, the number of the flat, and the date were left blank. The agreement provided that the plaintiff would use the flat as dwelling room only, and would observe and perform the regulations annexed to the agreement which provided for such matters as the removal of dust, supply of coal, and use of the lift, showing that they constituted a scheme for the general management of the building as residential flats for the convenience of all the tenants. The agreement also contained a covenant by the defendant for the quiet enjoyment of the flat. In November, 1895, the defendant began extensive alterations to the building for the purpose of converting it into a residential club, and the plaintiff moved for an injunction restraining the execution of the alterations and the defendant from causing a nuisance.

Held: (i) there had been no interference with the covenant for quiet enjoyment, for, though such a covenant entitled the plaintiff to freedom from disturbance by adverse claimants to the flat, it did not entitle her to freedom from the nuisance of a noise to the flat; (ii) the defendant was, however, in breach of the implied agreement that the building was subject to a scheme for letting it as residential flats, and the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from using it otherwise than for residential flats and from making alterations otherwise than for such user.

Action brought by the plaintiff, the tenant of a flat in a building known as Oxford Mansions, against the defendant her landlord for specific performance of the agreement under which she held the flat, and to restrain him from making alterations in the building alleged to be inconsistent with the agreement and from causing a nuisance to the plaintiff.

The agreement, which was dated Feb. 22, 1895, was to take all those five rooms known as Flat 21, Oxford Mansions, in the parish of St. Marylebone, for twelve months certain from Mar. 1, 1895, and thenceforth from month to month, terminable by one month's notice on either side, but with a proviso that the landlord should not give such notice unless for nonpayment of rent or breach of covenant for three years. The tenant agreed not to carry on or permit or suffer to be carried on on the premises any trade or business whatever nor to do any act which might be or grow to be a nuisance, disturbance, or annoyance to the landlord or his tenants, or to use the premises or any part thereof for any purpose other than dwelling-rooms, and to observe and perform all the annexed regulations and conditions. The landlord agreed to keep the entrance, staircase, and verandahs cleaned, lighted, and repaired, and that the tenant, paying the rent and observing and performing the covenants and conditions, should have quiet enjoyment of the premises. The regulations and conditions annexed to the agreement provided for the time during which the street door should be open, for the supply of keys to the tenants of each flat, the removal of dust and supply of coals, use of the lift, and other similar matters, showing, as the judge held, that the building was intended to be used for residential flats under conditions arranged for the benefit and convenience of all the occupants.

The landlord in November, 1895, commenced very extensive alterations in the building for the purpose of using it as a fashionable club. The defendant contended that only the ground and first floor were being altered, but the judge held that the alterations were intended to extend to the second floor, on which the plaintiff's flat was situated. The plaintiff now moved for an injunction restraining the defendant, the landlord, from interfering with the plaintiff's quiet enjoyment of the premises, and from doing anything upon the premises inconsistent with the agreement, and also for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to light and clean the passages leading to the plaintiff's flat.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Job Bradford for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff asks for an injunction to restrain the nuisance inflicted by the defendant's altering the whole character of the building. The defendant submits that he has not covenanted not to alter that character. That is not necessary. It is enough that the defendant has let the plaintiff her flat under restrictions and conditions which applied to all the flats, and were evidently intended for the benefit of all the residents.

Buckmaster for the defendant.—As to alleged breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, there has been no interference with the plaintiff's possession. What is proposed to be done is merely to put a glass roof over the quadrangle at the height of the first floor and to alter the ground and first floors. Nothing is to be done to the second floor, and the access to the plaintiff's flat will not be interfered with. As to the nuisance caused by the alterations, it is not suggested they are being made in an improper way, and if the defendant has a right to make them, the plaintiff must put up with the necessary inconvenience, which is only temporary, and any claim on this account is one for damages only. As to the alleged implied contract not to alter the character of the building, the defendant had never covenanted not to alter

it. In Spicer v. Martin (1) and the other cases relied on by the plaintiff, there was some representation to the plaintiff, either by published plan or a building scheme or otherwise, that all the houses in question were subject to the same covenants as those entered into by the plaintiff. Here there was no representation. The fact that an agreement is on a printed form does not entitle a tenant to assume that other flats or houses are subject to the same covenant.

NORTH, J.—In this case I think the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction in a form I will mention directly, though I think that the injunction asked for is one that could not be granted. The injunction asked for proceeds first of all upon the footing of an interference with the quiet enjoyment of the plaintiff, but I do not understand the covenant for quiet enjoyment to be a covenant which means that the plaintiff is to enjoy the premises without the nuisance of a noise in the neighbourhood. It is a covenant for freedom from disturbance by adverse claimants to the property. But I think the plaintiff is entitled to relief to a limited extent by reason of the implied obligation entered into by the parties to the agreement that was signed between them. The premises were built several years ago, and from the time they were built, subject to a certain exception I will mention presently, they have been used as residential flats, to use a well-known phrase of the present day. The plaintiff herself had lived there for some time under a similar agreement, and at that time the premises were all used as private residences in the same way as they were when she entered into this agreement on Feb. 22, 1895.

What is the agreement? I think that it is an agreement which shows on its face that it was made with respect to a certain flat forming part of a larger building all used for this particular purpose. Looking at this agreement itself, it is evidently not intended to apply to this particular flat alone. It is a printed agreement, and the names of the parties, the number of the flat, and the dates are left blank. That is filled in in this case by the date and the names of the parties, and it runs: "The landlord agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take all those five rooms known as flat No. 21, Oxford Mansions." So that there is a clear reference here to five rooms making up together a certain flat in a building, which everyone knew at the time was used as flats, and which was shown by this agreement to contain twenty-one flats at least, how many more I do not know. There are covenants not to do various things, and to use the rooms for private dwelling-rooms only. Then there is a further covenant to observe and conform in all respects to the annexed regulations and conditions. These regulations are most important. No one can read them without seeing that they contain a scheme for the general management of this building composed of several flats in such a way as to be suitable to the convenience of all the persons who are tenants of the building. It would be idle to suppose that these requirements were made except for the purpose of the convenience of all the tenants there, and when the landlord enters into this arrangement with each tenant it is obviously intended to be for the benefit of all the tenants. Whether these buildings were built originally with any such scheme in view, I do not know, and it seems to me entirely unimportant. They were at any rate existing as a series of flats all held in common occupation under a common management, though let to different tenants. It seems to me it is a case which comes exactly within the principles laid down by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Spicer v. Martin (1), which the other learned peers all agreed to definitely, though LORD FITZGERALD did suggest that on one ground he might possibly have been adverse. It is a very clear judgment, which has always been accepted as settling the law from that time onwards.

What has the defendant done here which is inconsistent with that? He is proceeding to convert the building into a club. According to his own case the ground floor and the first floor are all to be converted for that purpose. The inner quadrangle is to be covered over. As regards the upper floors, I think they are to be treated in the same way. It is clear that certain alterations are going on there now which apparently are inconsistent with the use of these upper floors as flats. For instance, all the kitchen ranges are being taken away from the flats on the ground that kitchens are no longer necessary there, and that something else is to be substituted. As regards this point the plaintiff swears that she has seen a prospectus in which it is said that it is proposed to have 100 bedrooms in connection with the club, and she says that is just about the number of rooms the upper floors would provide. It is quite true this statement has been made in an affidavit in reply, but I have not been asked to allow the matter to stand over in order that this statement might be disputed. Under these circumstances what is proposed is really to convert this building, consisting of private residences and flats, one of them occupied by the lady who is the plaintiff in the action, into a large club, to be occupied by members day and night. This lady's residence, instead of being isolated, is to be a residence in the middle of and surrounded by a building occupied by what is intended to be a fashionable club. I think that is such a departure from the arrangement made with the landlord by the agreement that she is entitled to have a judgment to restrain it.

I think the proper form of order will be to restrain the defendant from using, or permitting the premises to be used as a club or otherwise than as residential flats, or making or permitting to be made any alterations therein with a view to such user thereof as is hereby restrained. I mentioned that there was an exception to the use of this building as residential flats. It appears from the evidence that some parts of the ground floor have been used as offices. I do not mean to interfere with that, and words must be added to the effect that this order is not to prevent the use of the offices existing on the ground floor as heretofore. The injunction, of course, must not continue after the determination of the plaintiff's tenancy.

Re BOWLING AND WELBY'S CONTRACT

Company—Winding-up—Unregistered company—Need of at least eight members—“Members”—Actual members—Exclusion of past members (contributories), personal representatives of deceased member, and trustee of bankrupt member—Effect of invalid order.

To give the court jurisdiction to wind-up an unregistered company under the Companies Acts the company must at the date of the presentation of the petition consist of more than seven persons who are actually members: Companies Act, 1862, s. 199 [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 398 (e)]. The word “members” in this connection is not synonymous with contributories, and does not include persons liable to be put upon the list of contributories as past members, or the legal personal representatives of a deceased member, or a trustee in bankruptcy of a bankrupt member. An order winding-up a company of less than eight persons and so not complying with the statutory requirements, while binding on the company and on those claiming under it, would not be binding on persons who have rights outside it. Such an order can only be disputed on appeal.

Appeal from a decision of STIRLING, J., under a vendor and purchaser summons.

The Leeds and Yorkshire Permanent Benefit Building Society was established in 1851 under the Building Societies Act, 1836, but was not incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874 [by which the Act of 1836 was repealed]. Rule 33 of the society's rules provided:

"Upon the death of any member of the society holding shares upon which no advance shall have been made, his legal personal representative shall, within one month thereof, give notice in writing to the manager . . . in order that such shares may be registered in the name of such legal personal representative, or of such other person or persons entitled thereto as he or she shall by such notice direct; and shall also at the same time produce to the manager the probate of the will or letters of administration of such deceased member . . . or in default thereof he shall pay a fine of 1s. per share to the society, and upon such notice being given the shares of such deceased members shall be transferred into the name of such legal personal representative, or into the name of such other person or persons entitled thereto as such representative shall direct. . . . Provided always that, if no probate of will or letters of administration be so produced within two months after the decease of the shareholder, and the amount due to him does not exceed £20, then the trustees shall be at liberty, at or after the expiration of such two months, to pay or distribute the subscriptions paid in by the said shareholder, to his widow or children, or next of kin, as the trustees shall think fit, subject to any condition for the security of this society as the solicitor may think proper to require from the parties receiving the money."

On July 4, 1893, a petition was presented to the Leeds County Court for the compulsory winding-up of the society under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890. The petition was opposed by the sole trustee of the society on the ground that the society did not consist of more than seven members, and that the court had, therefore, no jurisdiction to make a winding-up order under s. 199 of the Companies Act, 1862 [see now the Companies Act, 1948, s. 398]. The county court judge nevertheless, on July 27, 1893, made the order, and J. Bowling, the official receiver to the court, became the liquidator of the society. On Nov. 30, 1893, the court made an order vesting in the liquidator all the property of the society. On Oct. 17, 1893, the liquidator put up for sale certain freehold premises belonging to the society, which were purchased by C. H. Welby subject to certain conditions of sale, not material for the purposes of this report. The title was investigated by the purchaser's solicitors, and ultimately he declined to complete on the ground that the liquidator could not make a good title to the property, as there were not more than seven members of the society at the date of the presentation of the petition, and consequently there was no jurisdiction to make the winding-up order. A summons was taken out by the liquidator under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to determine the validity of the objection. It was admitted that at the date of the presentation of the petition there were only four members on the register of the society. The liquidator, however, filed an affidavit in which he set out a schedule of alleged members which, by including as members the executors of certain deceased members and the trustee of a bankrupt member, showed a total of more than seven members. The summons came before STIRLING, J., who held that the objection was a valid one, and dismissed the summons. From this decision the liquidator appealed. A further affidavit was filed by the liquidator to support the contention that the society consisted of more than seven members at the date of the winding-up order, in which he gave the names of several members who had withdrawn from the society some time before the date of the winding-up order, and had been paid off, but were liable to be put on the list of contributories in respect of certain debts of the society incurred while they were members, and still unpaid.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. Section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts that, in order to start the machinery of winding-up an unregistered company, there must be a certain number of members, namely, more than seven, and I am of opinion they must be persons who are actually members. I think that the language is susceptible of no other construction. I cannot read it as meaning either actual members or persons who, once having been members, are liable to be contributories, and those are the words which must be put into the section in order to give it the construction contended for by the receiver. The statute itself draws a distinction between past members, though such past members are liable as contributories, and actual members. I cannot give a construction to the statute which would alter the language from "consisting of" into "members who are either now or have at one time been members." It is, therefore, to my mind impossible to give the construction contended for to the section.

That leads me to consider what is the effect of the order that has been made for winding-up this society, and which, in some sense, may be said to be res judicata. Probably that order is binding on the association as an association, and on everybody claiming under it, or taking a title under it; but I cannot agree that it is binding or incapable of being challenged by persons who have rights outside it. Therefore, I think it cannot be considered a judgment in rem for all time, and as against all persons, to establish the fact that that order was properly made. If it can be challenged by an outside person it is conclusive against the present application. That is enough to decide this case; but I do not desire to be understood to say that, if I had come to a different conclusion, all the difficulty would be removed. I do not wish to conclude myself by an abstract proposition on the subject, but in a case of this sort, bristling with difficulties in every direction, bristling with difficulties of fact to be determined, and then questions of law to be determined upon those questions of fact when they have been determined, I should be very sorry to be a party to a decision which would force upon an unwilling or reluctant purchaser any such title as this is. I ask myself, what would happen when he wanted to raise money on any property with such a title as this? I know full well the answer of a man of business would be that he would not look at a piece of property with such a title. Therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment of STIRLING, J., is right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This case has raised questions of some importance. In form the question is whether the liquidator of this company can make a good title to some land which is purported to be vested in him under s. 203 of the Companies Act, 1862 [now the Companies Act, 1948, s. 244]. That will depend on whether this company is one which could be properly wound-up under s. 199 of the 1862 Act. The liquidator's case is, that the company has been ordered to be wound-up, and he has been appointed its liquidator; an order has been made under s. 203 vesting in him the property of the company which is held by trustees for the company, and he wants to sell a part of the property under the direction of the court, and, he having put it up for sale the purchaser declines to complete because he is not satisfied that he will get a good title. I am not satisfied that he will get a good title; indeed, I think he will get a bad one. The question turns on the validity of the winding-up order. If that is right, no one quarrels with the appointment of the liquidator, or with the vesting order made under s. 203. In order to investigate the question with reference to the winding-up order, the jurisdiction to make it must be considered.

The company came into existence in 1851 under the provisions of the Building Societies Act, 1836. That Act was repealed by an Act passed in 1874; but the repeal need not be further alluded to. The society never was registered under the Companies Act, 1862, or any part of it. It was not registered with a view of its being wound-up; but a petition to wind-up was presented under s. 199 of the Companies Act, 1862. It is that section which gave the county court (the county court being the proper court in cases of building societies) jurisdiction to make a winding-up order. Section 199 runs thus:

"Subject as hereinafter mentioned any partnership, association, or company, except railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament, consisting of more than seven members, and not registered under this Act, and hereinafter included under the term unregistered company, may be wound-up under this Act."

What are the conditions which must be complied with in order to give the court jurisdiction to wind-up what is there called an unregistered company? It must be an association or company "consisting of more than seven members." What does "consisting of more than seven members" mean? It seems to me that the only interpretation of those words is consisting of more than seven members "at the time of the winding-up." I threw out a suggestion that it might have a wider meaning; but I do not think, for a reason I will give presently, that that can be so.

What is the meaning of "members"? It must mean members of all partnerships or associations, except railway companies, which are not registered under this Act. What is meant by "members"? No definite meaning is given by the statute to the word "members," and, as COTTON, L.J., held in Re South London Fish Market Co. (1), it does not necessarily mean "shareholders." In each case the constitution and rules of the particular company must be considered. The Building Societies Act, 1836, does not throw any light upon it. The rules of this building society are not very intelligible, and it is not very easy to find out what constitutes a member of it, but I think under these rules a member is a person who subscribes to the funds of the association and is admitted a member on the payment of a certain fee, and every member who pays his fees is entitled to a share. Did this society consist of seven members when this winding-up order was made? It seems to me that the answer to that is unquestionably: "No." It had a few members, but very few. It had had a great many past members, and it had some deceased members, and, as the evidence stood before STIRLING, J., it appeared that there were some living and some deceased members, and a bankrupt member. It is contended that that will not do, that the executor of a deceased member will not do. That is perfectly correct. You cannot look upon the executors or administrators of a deceased member as being "members" unless they become such. They may be sued for all sorts of liabilities, but executors and administrators will not become members without they know the extent of the liabilities attaching to them as such. Then is the trustee of a bankrupt member a member? Not at all. That contention is altogether wrong in point of law, and it would be most disastrous if it were not so.

A supplemental affidavit has been filed to suggest that there were seven members, because there are four existing members and a good many past members. Where are the past members? It was the consideration of that question which induced me to suggest the possibility of these being members for the purpose of winding-up. Counsel for the purchaser has answered the point I put by showing the inconvenience there would be about it. The machinery provided is simple. You have to find out whether there are more than seven members. Anyone who presents a petition to wind-up must find that out if he is proceeding under Part 8 of the Act of 1862, but, if he must embark in an investigation of how many deceased members there are, and how many other members there are, it is a thing which he cannot follow out. The construction at which I have arrived is that which was entertained by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Bolton Benefit Loan Society (2) and by the Court of Appeal in Re South London Fish Market Co. (1). Then what jurisdiction was there to make the order? I see none.

That raises another question. Is the order a binding order on everyone as long as it lasts? I do not think it is. There are some expressions of BRETT, L.J., in Re Padstow Total Loss and Collision Assurance Association (3), where he said (20 Ch.D. at p. 145):

"In this case an order has been made to wind-up an association or company as such. That order was the order of a Superior Court, which Superior Court has jurisdiction, in a certain given state of facts, to make a winding-up order, and if there has been a mistake made it is a mistake as to the facts of the

A particular case, and not the assumption of a jurisdiction which the court had not. I am inclined therefore to say that this order could never so long as it existed be treated either by the court that made it or by any other court as a nullity, and the only way of getting rid of it was by appeal."

B I have read that passage because I think that is the strongest expression of opinion that can be found in the books to the effect that a winding-up order can only be disputed on appeal. The court in deciding that case was dealing with an appeal from a winding-up order, and it was an appeal by a contributory. It was a case of one of those illegal companies which, being illegal, there was no jurisdiction to wind-up, but a winding-up order was made, and what I think BRETT, L.J., must have meant was that until the order was set aside on an appeal the company could not be prejudiced, nor could any person who paid under it. I do not think he could have intended to go the length of saying that any person who was no party to the litigation and was not claiming through the company was bound by a winding-up order being made which there was no jurisdiction to make. A purchaser cannot be bound at all unless it is a judgment in rem, and I do not think that BRETT, L.J., thought that that judgment was one. I allude to that because it is very important.

C If the liquidator made out that this order was unimpeachable, he would make out a perfectly good title: but a purchaser is entitled to look into it, and see whether it is so. If he can show that this order has been made by a court which had no jurisdiction to make it, it cuts away the title of the liquidator who claims under it. The consequence is, that this appeal must be dismissed. It is unfortunate, because I can see very well the consequences if this winding-up order is not a valid order; it will not be quarrelled with I dare say, but it does disclose a blot upon the statute, which I confess I had not seen before, of the case of a large society reduced to a few members to which the Act will not apply. In this case you have a large society with less members than eight. What is the consequence? The society cannot be wound-up, and you must do the best you can, and those persons who are compelled to pay must take what steps they can to get contribution from others, and no doubt the scheme of the Act was intended to get rid of the very great inconvenience of such a course. I think the true construction of s. 199 is what I have mentioned, that this order is invalid and can be impeached by a purchaser, and that no title to the property can be made by the liquidator.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question depends upon the true construction of s. 199 of the Act of 1862. The section provides that "any partnership, association, or company . . . consisting of more than seven members and not registered under this Act . . . may be wound-up under this Act."

I What is the meaning of that? Does it mean any partnership, association, or company consisting of more than seven persons who may at one time have been shareholders, but have withdrawn, and are still liable as contributories: or does it mean any company consisting of seven members who are actually members at the time when the winding-up order is sought to be obtained? If that section stood alone, I am not saying that I should have thought it plain that it meant a society consisting of more than seven members who at one time might be contributories, but meant seven persons at the date of the winding-up. This section does not, in my judgment, stand alone on this point, because it appears to me that ss. 48 and 79 and 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, one and all point to the fact as regards ss. 48 and 79 of there being less than seven members, that is actual members, at the time to which the section refers, and in s. 199 to there being more than seven members at the time which is there suggested. It seems to me, therefore, that, as regards the construction of this section, the matter is tolerably clear.

Then there is the question with reference to executors, and administrators, and trustees in bankruptcy. In my judgment, for the reasons which have been given,

I am clearly of opinion that this order was made by the learned county court judge without jurisdiction, and that, on the true construction of s. 199, there were not more than seven members, especially looking at s. 48, because, if the construction which is put by the liquidator is to include trustees and executors, the words in s. 48 must be construed in some other way than that in which they must be construed in s. 199. But then it is said that a winding-up order is a judgment against all the world. It may be that it is a judgment binding on those who were members of the company and the company itself, but it is not a judgment binding on a stranger on whom the vendor is attempting to force a title through an order which the court holds to be invalid and made without jurisdiction. In my opinion, it does not bind the purchaser. He is entitled to take the objection which he does, and, therefore, the judgment of STIRLING, J., should be affirmed.

COPPEN v. MOORE

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Sir Francis Jeune, P., Chitty, L.J., Wright, Darling and Channell, J.J.), March 25, April 4, May 14, 1898]

[Reported [1898] 2 Q.B. 300, 306; 67 L.J.Q.B. 689; 78 L.T. 520; 62 J.P. 453; 46 W.R. 620; 14 T.L.R. 323, 414; 42 Sol. Jo. 397, 539; 19 Cox, C.C. 45]

Merchandise Marks—False trade description—"Trade description"—Description on invoice—Verbal description—Liability of master for act of servant—Defence—Proof of good faith—Onus—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict., s. 28), s. 2 (2).

The respondent called at one of the appellant's shops and asked for an English ham. The salesman pointed to several hams, said that they were Scotch, and were 8½d. a pound. The respondent said that he would take one, and the salesman passed it inside to another salesman and said: "Weigh up Scotch ham, 8½d." The respondent before paying asked for an invoice with "Scotch ham" on it. It was first given to him without those words, but they were subsequently added. The salesman then admitted that it was an American ham. The appellant had sent out to the managers of all his shops the following notice: "Most important.—Please instruct your assisants most explicitly that the hams described in the list as 'breakfast hams' must not be sold under any specific name of place or origin—that is to say, they must not be described as Bristol, Bath, Wiltshire, or any such title, but simply as 'breakfast hams.'" The magistrates were of opinion that the appellant was guilty of an offence against s. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, in that he unlawfully sold to the respondent an American ham to which a false trade description, "Scotch ham," had been applied, and that he had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act.

Held: (i) there was a sufficient trade description in the invoice to satisfy the Act; (ii) whether or not the appellant had taken all means to stop these representations was a matter of fact for the magistrates; and (iii) the effect of the Act was to make the master or principal liable criminally for the acts of his servants or agents where the conduct constituting the offence was pursued by them within the scope or in the course of their employment, except that the master could be relieved where he could prove that he had acted in good faith and had done all that was reasonably possible to prevent offences against the Act.

Notes. In Slatcher v. George Mence Smith, Ltd., [1951] 2 All E.R. 388, the King's Bench Divisional Court did not follow the construction put by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, at p. 930, post, on the words in s. 2 (2) "otherwise he had acted innocently" as meaning acting in good faith and doing all that was reasonably possible to prevent the commission of offences against the Act, but construed them as meaning acting inadvertently or under a misapprehension or mistake of fact.

A new subsection was substituted for s. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, by s. 4 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1953 (33 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 920, which did not alter the law, but clarified s. 2 (2) of the 1887 Act. Section 2 (2) (c) of the 1887 Act is now s. 2 (2) (b).

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Richmond.

The appellant was summoned for that he did unlawfully sell certain goods to which a false trade description was applied, and was convicted. The following facts were proved: John Moore, the respondent, an inspector of the Bacon Curers' Association of Great Britain and Ireland, went on Sept. 4, 1897, to the London Supply Stores, 42, George Street, Richmond, the place of business in Richmond of H. W. Coppen, the appellant, accompanied by one Ward, and met a salesman, Meslin, at the door and asked him for a small English ham. Meslin pointed to a number of American hams on a shelf outside the shop window of which the ham produced in court was one. Meslin said, "These are Scotch hams," and being asked the price by Moore said 8½d. Moore said to Meslin, "I'll have that one," and Meslin passed the ham through the open shop window to Wheeler, another shop assistant of the appellant, and said, "Weigh up Scotch ham, 8½d." Wheeler weighed it and said it came to 5s. 5½d. Moore then asked Wheeler to make him out an account and put on it "Scotch ham," as he bought it as such. Wheeler handed Moore an invoice (produced). As it had not the word "Scotch" on it then, Moore did not take it, and told Wheeler to put the word "Scotch," as he had "bought it as such." Wheeler then did so and handed Moore the account. Moore then paid for it. The invoice was as follows:

"The London Supply Stores, High Street, Putney. Coppen Bros., sole proprietors.—7.11 Ham 8½d., Scotch, 5s. 5½d.—Paid, E. W."

Moore then told Wheeler who he was and asked if he still said it was a Scotch ham. Wheeler paused and then said, "No, it's an American." Moore then called in Meslin who sold him the ham and told him who he was and asked him if he still said it was a Scotch ham. Meslin at once said it was an American ham. Moore reminded him that he sold it to him as a Scotch ham outside the door. Meslin said, "Yes, I did." Moore then asked to see the proprietor or manager of the shop. The manager was called and gave Moore his name as Bedford. Moore then told Bedford, in the presence of the two shopmen, the whole circumstances of the sale. The manager then said it was a long-cut American. He also said something to the effect that they (Meslin and Wheeler) had no right to do anything of the kind. They made no reply.

A On the part of the respondent it was contended that the giving of the invoice by appellant's servant was applying a false trade description: Budd v. Lucas (1). That the appellant was responsible for the acts of his servants in making the sale accompanied with the invoice: Collman v. Mills (2). That there need not be any intention to defraud: Starey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Co. (3). That the appellant was the vendor, and warranted the sale of the ham as a Scotch ham, no writing to the contrary being given pursuant to s. 17 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. That the appellant was liable for the acts of his servants, as he had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, nor was he brought within any of the exceptions of the Act. That in any event the appellant was liable to pay the costs of the prosecution, as he had given no notice under the Act.

C On the part of the appellant it was contended (i) That a verbal statement such as that made by Meslin did not constitute the application of a false trade description within the Act; (ii) that the word "Scotch" being put upon the invoice at the purchaser's request, no fraud was intended or committed by Wheeler in so putting on such word, and that therefore no offence was committed by him; (iii) that, if an offence had been committed by Meslin and Wheeler, the appellant was not liable, as such offence was committed by his servants, in his absence, without his knowledge, and against his express instructions; (iv) that the appellant had taken all reasonable precautions against committing any offence against the Act. The Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was quoted, and Newman v. Jones (4) was cited.

E The appellant proved that he was a member of the firm of Coppen Bros., and that they had six shops and had been in business twenty years; that they had a wholesale warehouse also; that he occasionally visited the branch shops, but was not at Richmond on the Saturday and had not been there all the week. He produced a duplicate of a notice, sent out by him to the Richmond and other shops with the manager's initials on it acknowledging its receipt, which read :

"Marsham Street, Feb. 25, 1897.—Most important.—Please instruct your assistants most explicitly that the hams described in list as "breakfast hams" must not be sold under any specific name of place or origin. That is to say, they must not be described as Bristol, Bath, Wiltshire, or any such title, but simply as breakfast hams. To Mr. Bedford, Richmond.—Please sign and return.—H. W. Coppen."

At the foot were the initials E. B., the initials of Bedford, the manager. The appellant stated that he had no reason to believe that his instructions were not being carried out.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant was guilty of an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, in that he unlawfully sold to the respondent an American ham to which a false trade description, "Scotch ham," was applied, and that he had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act. The question on which the opinion of the court was desired was whether the justices, on the above statement, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

By the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (2) :

"Every person who sells . . . any goods . . . to which . . . any false trade description is applied . . . shall, unless he proves (a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the . . . trade description; and (b) on demand . . . he gave all the information in his power . . . ; or (c) that otherwise he had acted innocently; be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Bonsey for the appellant.

Buszard, Q.C., and A. J. David for the respondent.

WRIGHT, J.—In my opinion the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, does not apply to trade descriptions purely and entirely verbal. The whole of the Act, with the exception of s. 20, shows this. It applies to marks and other signs apart from oral descriptions. It applies to marks, and marks only. If it had been a case of merely a verbal description, I do not see why proceedings should not have been taken under the Food and Drugs Act. But in this case the description was in writing by the invoice. The marking was in this invoice; that is sufficient trade description to satisfy the Act. Budd v. Lucas (1) is a strong authority to that effect. As to the second question, whether the appellant is exempted on the ground that all means were taken to stop these representations, there is, I think, a finding of fact by the justices, and that point is not open to us. With regard to question three, whether an employer can be liable for the unauthorised acts of his servant, it would, I think, be a strong thing to hold that the employer would be liable to an indictment for that. However, this question, and this question only, must go before the special court.

DARLING, J., concurred.

April 4, 1898. Argument on point reserved.

Asquith, Q.C., and Bonsey for the appellant.

Jelf, Q.C., and A. J. David for the respondent.

May 14, 1898. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court, in which, after stating the facts, and that the ham in question would come within the category of breakfast hams, he continued: It is now necessary to consider the statute in question and its application to the facts proved. Section 2 is the important section; s. 2 (1) deals with the forging of any trade mark and with the false application to goods of any such mark or of any false trade description, and enacts that, subject to the provisions of the Act, an offence shall have been committed by such forging or application unless the party charged proves that he acted without intent to defraud; s. 2 (2) enacts (omitting words immaterial in this case) that every person who sells any goods to which any false trade description is applied shall be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves—(a) that having taken all reasonable precautions he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description; and (b) that on demand duly made he gave all information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods; or (c) that otherwise he acted innocently. By s. 3 it is enacted that “trade description” shall mean any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, as to (among other things) the place or country in which any goods were made or produced. Later in the section it is enacted that the expression “false trade description” shall mean a trade description false in any material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied. By s. 5 (1) it is enacted that a person shall be deemed to have applied a trade description to goods who applies it to the goods themselves or uses a trade description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are designated or described by that trade description.

In Budd v. Lucas (1) it was decided that where certain casks of beer were delivered accompanied by an invoice in which the casks were falsely described as “barrels” (which word had acquired the character of a trade description) it was held that an offence under s. 2 (1), of the Act had been committed, although the invoice containing the false trade description was not physically attached to the casks. I think this case was well decided; in other words, I think that it is not necessary to constitute the offence that there shall be any physical connection between the false trade description and the goods to which it is applied. It was admitted that the description “Scotch ham” was a trade description and it was found that it was applied to the ham sold by the appellant’s employees and it was admittedly false. It was not contended that it was not material. In these circumstances it is clear

A that an offence against the Act was committed by the salesman and by the assistant of the appellant.

But the question which the court is now called upon to decide is whether the appellant also is not personally liable to be convicted. This was the question argued before us. The appellant's contention was that the charge here preferred was a criminal charge and that the general principle of law applied—nemo reus est nisi mens sit rea. There is no doubt that this is the general rule, but it is subject to exceptions, and the question here is whether the present case falls within the rule or within the exception. Apart from statute, exceptions have been engrafted upon the rule; for example, in R. v. Stephens (5), the defendant was held liable on indictment for obstructing navigation by throwing rubbish into a river from a quarry owned by the defendant but managed by his son, although it was proved that the men employed at the quarry had been by order prohibited from doing the acts complained of. No doubt in that case the fact that the proceedings were only in form criminal was adverted to by the judges who decided it, but the fact remains that the defendant was criminally indicted. But by far the greater number of exceptions engrafted upon the general rule are cases in which it has been decided that by various statutes criminal responsibility has been put upon masters for the acts of their servants.

Among such cases are Mullins v. Collins (6), where a licensed victualler was convicted of an offence under s. 16 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for supplying liquor to a constable on duty, although this was done by his servant without the knowledge of his master. Again, in Bond v. Evans (7), where a licensed victualler was convicted of an offence against s. 17 of the same Act where gaming had been allowed in the licensed premises by the servant in charge of the premises, although without the knowledge of his master. The decisions in these and in other like cases were based upon the construction of the statutes in question. The court, in fact, came to the conclusion that, having regard to the language, scope, and object of those Acts, the legislature intended to fix criminal responsibility upon the master for acts done by his servant in the course of his employment, although such acts were not authorised by the master, and may even have been expressly prohibited by him.

The question then in this case comes to be narrowed to the simple point, whether upon the true construction of the statute here in question the master was intended to be made criminally responsible for acts done by his servant in contravention of the Act, where such acts were done, as in this case, within the scope or in the course of their employment. In my judgment, it was clearly the intention of the legislature to make the master criminally liable for such acts, unless he was able to rebut the prima facie presumption of guilt by one or other of the methods pointed out in the Act. Take the facts here and apply the Act to them. To begin with, it cannot be doubted that the appellant sold the ham in question although the transaction was carried out by his servants. In other words, he was the seller although not the actual salesman. It is clear also, as already stated, that the ham was sold with a "false trade description" which was material. If so, there is evidence establishing a prima facie case of an offence against the Act having been committed by the appellant. But it is only a prima facie case. The burden of proof is shifted upon the appellant, and he might meet successfully that prima facie case if he is able, where the charge is under the first sub-section of s. 2, to prove that he acted without intent to defraud; or, where the charge is under s. 2 (2) if he is able to prove (a) that he had taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act and had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description in question, and (b) that on demand he had given full information, or (c) if he is able to prove that otherwise he acted innocently.

It seems clear that paras. (a) and (b) of s. 2 (2) apply to cases where the goods in question are in the possession of the accused for sale or are sold with the forged trade mark or false trade description already stamped upon them or otherwise applied to them, and not to a case like the present, where the false trade description is applied upon the occasion and as part of the terms of sale; and in the latter case the accused must rely for his exculpation upon para. (c)—namely, by showing that he had acted innocently. In the present case there was ample evidence to justify the conclusion of the magistrates that the appellant was prima facie guilty of the offence charged, and that prima facie case has not been met in the manner required by the Act. The magistrates, indeed, have affirmatively found—in the terms of para. (a)—that the appellant had not, in fact, taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, but I have already pointed out that that clause does not directly apply to the facts of this case. This finding is, therefore, not strictly relevant, although it suggests an important element in determining whether the accused is innocent; but what is material to note is that the magistrates do not appear to have been asked to find, and certainly they do not in fact find, that the appellant acted innocently within the meaning of para. (c). There was evidence before them that the American hams in question were dressed so as to deceive the public; and this probably explains the reason of the affirmative finding to which I have adverted and the absence of the finding that the appellant had acted innocently within the meaning of para. (c).

In answer, then, to the question which alone is put to us, namely, whether, upon the facts stated, the decision of the magistrates convicting the appellant was in point of law correct, my answer is that, in my judgment, it was. When the scope and object of the Act are borne in mind, any other conclusion would, to a large extent, render the Act ineffective for its avowed purposes. The circumstances of the present case afford a convenient illustration of this. The appellant, under the style of the "London Supply Stores," carries on an extensive business as grocer and provision dealer, having, it appears, six shops or branch establishments, and having also a wholesale warehouse. It is obvious that, if sales with false trade descriptions could be carried out in these establishments with impunity so far as the principal is concerned, the Act would, to a large extent, be nugatory. I conceive the effect of the Act to be to make the master or principal liable criminally (as he is already by law civilly) for the acts of his agents and servants in all cases within the sections with which we are dealing, where the conduct constituting the offence was pursued by such servants and agents within the scope or in the course of their employment, subject to this—that the master or principal may be relieved from criminal responsibility where he can prove that he had acted in good faith and had done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by his agents and servants of offences against the Act. The result, therefore, is that the conviction will be affirmed, and with costs.

I wish to add that the form in which this Case is stated is not satisfactory. It does not throughout clearly distinguish between what was merely evidence and what was proved to the satisfaction of the magistrates. It is important that it should be borne in mind that when a Case is submitted to the court it ought to state clearly what the facts proved were, and not merely what the evidence was.

When a debtor pays money on account to his creditor and makes no appropriation to particular items, the creditor has the right of appropriation and may exercise it up to the last moment by action or otherwise. The application of the money is governed by the expressed, implied, or presumed intention of the creditor, and not by any rigid rule of law. The rule in Clayton's Case (1) (1816), 1 Mer. at p. 585, does not apply where there is no account current between the parties, nor where, from an account rendered or other circumstances, it appears that the creditor intended to reserve the right of appropriation.

The appellants supplied necessities to the respondents' ship, but the bills drawn by the captain were dishonoured. The appellants accepted the respondents' offer to pay them a sum due to the respondents from a third party if the appellants would surrender dishonoured bills to the same amount, and in consideration of the payment the appellants agreed not to arrest any of the respondents' ships for three months. The appellants later delivered an account of money due to them from the respondents on various transactions, giving credit for the amount received from the third party. Two of the items on this account were of the same date and the first in order was in respect of the ship. The account was not paid and the appellants arrested the ship for the balance due.

Held: the delivery of the account did not constitute an appropriation of the sum received from the third party to any particular part of the indebtedness, and the appellants were, therefore, justified in their arrest of the ship for the balance.

Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: The principle of Clayton's Case (1) cannot apply to two transactions of the same date.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., KAY and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.), delivered in July, 1895, affirming a decision of BRUCE, J., sitting as judge of the Admiralty Division, in March, 1895. D

The action was brought by the appellants, Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd., against the respondents, the owners of the steamship Mecca, for necessities supplied to the vessel. The point raised for the determination of the court was whether certain payments made by the respondents to the appellants in respect of such necessities had been appropriated to the discharge of certain items in the account. E

The facts are fully set out in the speeches of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSCHELL.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Bucknill, Q.C., and G. Ince for the appellants.

Pyke, Q.C., Nelson, and Henriques for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration. F

April 8, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an action against the owners of the steamship Mecca (formerly the State of Nevada) for necessities supplied to that vessel in Alexandria on two occasions in March, 1894. The owners of the Mecca were also the owners of a vessel called the Medina (formerly the State of Pennsylvania), to which necessities had also been supplied by the appellants. Bills were drawn by the captains of the vessels on the owners and accepted, but dishonoured, and after some correspondence the owners offered to pay £900 which was due to them from some underwriters, if the appellants were prepared to hand over the bills to an equivalent amount. The appellants agreed to give a receipt on account of the bills owing, though they could not hand over the bills themselves as they were in Egypt, but they gave a receipt in the following form : G H

"Received from Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co., £900 (nine hundred pounds) on account of moneys owing us by the Hamidieh Steamship Co. of Constantinople. The drafts embodying this amount being in Egypt we cannot now return them, but herewith agree to take no further action in connection therewith during the period agreed upon between us. Per proc. Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd., Aug. 15, 1894.—W. Ganslandt." I

The correspondence and account raise the question which we are called upon to determine. The Mecca was arrested for the amount alleged to be due, and in this action if the amount for necessities supplied to the Mecca has been paid, the appellants must fail, notwithstanding that the amount of £401 2s 9d. is still due to them. The question, of course, is whether there has been an appropriation of the sum of £900 by the parties, or whether by law there is any rule by which we can

A determine in respect of what indebtedness that £900 was paid. The correspondence and the account, so far as they are material to the case, are as follows :

B “June 22, 1894. Messrs. Theodoridi & Co., Constantinople.—Dear Sirs,—In reply to your favour of 15th instant we now beg to inform you that we have arranged with Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co. to withhold from arresting any of your steamers for the next three months, provided that the full amount due to ourselves and our friends be paid us out of the moneys Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co. hope to get from the underwriters.—Yours truly, Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd. —W. Ganslandt.”

C “August 22, 1894.—C. A. Theodoridi, Esq., Constantinople.—Dear Mr. Theodoridi,—We were pleased at receiving the £900 from Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co. on account of the money due to us from the Hamidieh Steamship Co., and thank you for your good offices in the matter. We hope it is the company's intention to at once remit us the balance due, namely, £401 2s. 9d., as per statement herewith, for I think you will agree with me that when the company is finding some thousands a month for financing the Mecca, paying canal dues, coals in cash, etc., it is absurd to let the above amount be outstanding, and I D hope therefore you will at once make a settlement with us, and thus obviate the necessity of our taking further steps to secure it.—Yours faithfully, E. Moxey.”

The statement which accompanied the letter of Aug. 22 was headed :

E “3, Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C.—Aug. 22, 1894.—Messrs. The Hamidieh Steamship Co., Constantinople.—In account with Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd.”

[Then followed particulars of four bills with legal expenses added. The bills were entered in order of date, but a Medina bill for £630 came after a Mecca bill of the same date. A charge of £7 2s. 5d. for telegrams on Aug. 22 and of interest to date of £20 6s. 4d. brought the total to £1,301 2s. 9d.; then a line was F drawn and the sum of £900 was deducted from the £1,301 2s. 9d., leaving the balance of £401 2s. 9d.]

It is said that the account brings the question within the authority of Clayton's Case (1), and in order to see whether this is so, it is necessary to consider what Clayton's Case (1) was, and the reasons given by SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., who G decided it. He says (1 Mer. at p. 608) that where an account current is kept between parties as a banking account,

I “there is no room for any other appropriation than that which arises from the order in which the receipts and payments take place, and are carried into the account. Presumably, it is the sum first paid in which is first drawn out. It is the first item on the debit side of the account which is discharged or reduced by the first item on the credit side; the appropriation is made by the very fact of setting the two items against each other.”

This rule, so formulated, has been adopted in all the courts in Westminster Hall (see Field v. Carr (2)). It is to be remembered, however, that on more than one occasion it has been pointed out that this is not an invariable rule of law; but I the circumstances of a case may afford ground for inferring that transactions of the parties were not so intended as to come under this general rule, and if it were necessary to decide it, I confess I should have great doubt whether the transactions I have described would not themselves negative the application of such a rule. The letter of June 22 shows that the parties intended that the right of arresting the ship should be preserved, and that it was only to be suspended for the three months, and I cannot think that, knowing perfectly well what they were about, either of the parties could have supposed that the payment was to be so appropriated as to release the Mecca from the liability to arrest.

But, in truth, I think this case is not within the rule at all. This is not an account current; there is no setting one item against another; credit is given for the £900 at the end of all the items. They are all separate transactions, and, although on one piece of paper, seem to represent only historically the transactions as they occurred. How the principle of SIR WILLIAM GRANT'S decision can apply to two transactions of identically the same date, I cannot understand. There is in respect of these items no earlier date, it is the mere fact that one precedes the other in its place on the paper. I think it would be extremely inconvenient in business to draw inferences from the shape or order of accounts, and I think it would be an altogether novel application of a principle which has been established so long that I should feel great reluctance to engraft a new application upon it. In this case it appears to me that the letter and account negative any appropriation of the £900 to any particular part of the indebtedness, and as the appellants were entitled to appropriate, I think they have done so by this action; and I, therefore, move your Lordships that the judgment be reversed, and judgment be entered for the appellants for £401 2s. 9d.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This action was brought in the Admiralty Division in rem by the appellants against the owners of the steamship Mecca as defendants. The action was brought to recover the amount of certain bills of exchange. The defence was payment. It is admitted that, unless and except in so far as this defence can be established, the action is an undefended one.

The steamship Mecca was formerly called the State of Nevada. The master of the vessel in March, 1894, drew a bill upon his owners for £176 5s., the price of coals and other necessities supplied at Alexandria by the agents of the appellants. In the same month he drew another bill for £194 8s., the price of necessities supplied at Port Said. Both these bills, which were at thirty days' sight and payable to the order of the appellants, were accepted by the owners, but were dishonoured. The owners of the State of Nevada were the Hamidieh Co., who were also the owners of another vessel then called the State of Pennsylvania, now the Medina. Necessaries had been supplied by the appellants for this vessel, and the bills drawn in respect thereof had likewise been dishonoured. A sum of money being due from certain underwriters in London to the Hamidieh Co., which was to be collected by Messrs. Moss & Co., it was arranged that a certain portion of this money should be paid over by them to the appellants when collected on account of their claim in respect of the unpaid bills. The sum of £900 was accordingly handed over to the appellants on Aug. 15, 1894. Prior to making this payment Messrs. Moss asked the appellants if, on payment of that sum, they would be prepared to hand in exchange acceptances of the Hamidieh Co. to a like amount. The appellants wrote in reply that, as the bills were in Egypt, they would be unable to do this, but would give a receipt for the money on account of the bills owing. The receipt given was in the following terms: [HIS LORDSHIP read the receipt.] On Aug. 22, the appellants wrote a letter to the agent of the Hamidieh Co., in which, after referring to the receipt of the £900, they added: "We hope it is the company's intention to at once remit us the balance due, namely, £401 2s. 9d. as per statement herewith." The statement enclosed was headed: "Messrs. The Hamidieh Steamship Co., Constantinople, in account with Cory Bros. & Co., Ltd." The case turns so largely on this account that it is necessary to give it somewhat in detail. [HIS LORDSHIP read the account.]

It was held by the court below that the first three items in the account must be treated as discharged by the payment made, and that there was consequently nothing due in respect of the Mecca at the time this action was commenced. It is contended by the appellants that, inasmuch as the payment was not appropriated by the debtors, it was open to them to make any appropriation of it they pleased, and that, not having prior to bringing the action made any other appropriation, they were entitled to treat the payment as made on account of the Medina items, and

A thus to maintain the action against the Mecca. The case was treated in the Court of Appeal as governed by Clayton's Case (1). No appropriation of the payment having been made at the time, it was held, that it must be attributed as a matter of law to the first three items of the account, and that the items relating to the Mecca must, therefore, be treated as paid.

B I do not think the present case is governed by Clayton's Case (1). It was there decided that, where there is a current account between parties, and payments are made without appropriation of them, they are to be attributed in point of law to the earliest items in the account. In the present case, at the time the payment was made, no account had been delivered by the appellants to the respondents. The debts in respect of the two vessels arose from transactions which were entirely distinct, they had never been brought into a common account. An account comprising all the items was for the first time made out and transmitted by the C appellants to the respondents after payment was made. In the account thus made out credit was given for the £900 which had been received. At the time of the payment, therefore, there was no account to the items of which the payment could by operation of law be appropriated.

D The question to be determined is: What was the effect of the transmission to the respondents of the statement of account of Aug. 22. It is clear that, if the appellants had merely entered in their own books an account such as was transmitted, it would not have amounted to any appropriation by them, and they would still have been at liberty to appropriate the payment as they pleased. It is equally clear, however, that when once they had made an appropriation and communicated it to their debtors, they would have no right to appropriate it otherwise. E What, then, was the effect of bringing the items of debt into a single account, and transmitting it to their debtors in the manner they did? I have had some doubt whether it might not be regarded as indicating to the debtors an appropriation of the sum paid to the earlier items in the order in which they appear in the account. But, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, including the correspondence between the parties, I have come to the conclusion that the appellants F did not intend to make any such appropriation, and that the respondents were not entitled so to regard it.

G LORD MACNAGHTEN stated the facts, and continued: The period of grace having expired, the present action was brought against the Mecca, which was found at Cardiff in the beginning of October, 1894. The action was brought to recover the moneys due in respect of the necessities supplied to the Mecca, and an account was delivered appropriating the £900 to the Medina bills and legal expenses in connection with that vessel. In addition to other defences which have failed, the respondents pleaded that part of the money paid to the plaintiffs by H. E. Moss & Co. "was in respect of the whole amount sought to be recovered by the plaintiffs" H in the action. At the trial the defendants' counsel relied on the statement of account of Aug. 22, 1894, as an appropriation by the plaintiffs of the £900 towards the payment of the four bills in the order in which they were entered in the account, and contended that by such appropriation the Mecca bills had been paid. BRUCE, J., held that the payment was, by law, appropriated to the earlier items in the account, and gave judgment for the defendants. The judgment was affirmed on I appeal.

I have some difficulty in following the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. There seems to be an error in the shorthand notes, because the Master of the Rolls is made to say that the account came in the first instance from the company. But, if I understand his meaning aright, he does say that the account passing between the parties did not of itself operate as an appropriation or afford any indication of an intention to appropriate; it was as if each party in turn had said, "Here is the account. I do not appropriate." KAY, L.J., treats the case as governed by Clayton's Case (1), to which the Master of the Rolls also refers. "I cannot see any reason," KAY, L.J., says, "why Clayton's Case (1) does not apply to the facts before us." Later on, after stating the facts as they appeared to him, "That is," he observes, "the very case to which Clayton's Case (1) would apply." A. L. SMITH, L.J., seems to take the same view as the Master of the Rolls. "Neither party," he says, "appropriated the payments to anything." Then he adds, "the £900, by the law, goes to the earlier items." If what occurred in August did not amount to an appropriation it is difficult to see why the appellants were not at liberty to make their election in October when they found the Mecca at Cardiff, and certainly I am at a loss to understand what bearing the doctrine of Clayton's Case (1) can have upon the question.

There can be no doubt what the law of England is on this subject. When a debtor is making a payment to his creditor he may appropriate the money as he pleases, and the creditor must apply it accordingly. If the debtor does not make any appropriation at the time when he makes the payment, the right of application devolves on the creditor. In 1813, when Clayton's Case (1) was decided, there seems to have been an authority for saying that the creditor was bound to make his election at once according to the rules of the civil law, or at any rate within a reasonable time, whatever that expression in such a connection may be taken to mean. But it has long been held, and it is now quite settled, that the creditor has the right of election "up to the very last moment," and he is not bound to declare his election in express terms. He may declare it by bringing an action, or in any other way that makes his meaning and intention plain. Where the election is with the creditor it is always his intention expressed or implied or presumed, and not any rigid rule of law, that governs the application of the money. The presumed intention of the creditor may no doubt be gathered from a statement of account or anything else which indicates an intention one way or the other, and is communicated to the debtor, provided there are no circumstances pointing in an opposite direction. But so long as the election rests with the creditor, and he has not determined his choice, there is no room, as it seems to me, for the application of rules of law such as the rule of the civil law, reasonable as it is, that if the debts are equal the payment received is to be attributed to the debt first contracted.

Clayton's Case (1) was this. Clayton had a current account with a firm of bankers. One of the firm died. Some time afterwards the bank failed. The customer's account was kept from first to last as one unbroken account. At the date of the death of the deceased partner the customer had a large balance to his credit. Afterwards he drew out sums which in the aggregate exceeded that balance. On the other hand, moneys were paid in from time to time to his credit, and at the date of the failure the balance in his favour was rather larger than it was at the date of the death. He claimed a right to attribute his drawings after the death to subsequent payments in; but SIR WILLIAM GRANT said not and he distinguished the case from authorities which had been cited in favour of the claimant by saying (1 Mer. at p. 608) :

"They were all cases of distinct insulated debts between which a plain line of separation could be drawn. But this is the case of a banking account where all the sums paid in form one blended fund, parts of which have no longer any distinct existence. Neither banker nor customer ever thinks of saying this draft is to be placed to the account of the £500 paid in on Monday, and this other to the account of the £500 paid in on Tuesday. There is a fund of £1,000 to draw upon, and that is enough. In such a case there is no room for any other appropriation than that which arises from the order in which the receipts and payments take place and are carried into the account. Presumably, it is the sum first paid in that is first drawn out. It is the first item on the debit side of the account that is discharged or reduced by the first item on the credit side. The appropriation is made by the very act of setting the two items against each other. Upon that principle all accounts current are settled, and particularly cash accounts."

A The facts of the present case are very different. There is no current account between the parties here; there was no account between them at all until the bills were dishonoured; the debts were distinct. But it is, I think, important to observe that, even in cases prima facie falling within the doctrine of Clayton's Case (1), the account between the parties, however it may be kept and rendered, is not conclusive on the question of appropriation. In a case in the Exchequer Chamber, in 1874 (City Discount Co. v. McLean (3)), where there was a current and unbroken account between the parties, Clayton's Case (1) was pressed upon the court. BRAMWELL, B., said (L.R. 9 C.P. at p. 698):

"I quite agree with the principle of the cases cited, such as Clayton's Case (1) and Bodenham v. Purchas (4), and I think we ought to follow them where applicable. But we must decide every case according to its own circumstances."

BLACKBURN, J., added (ibid. at p. 701):

"The true rule is that laid down in Henniker v. Wigg (5), which is that accounts rendered are evidence of the appropriation of payments to the earlier items, but that may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary."

The rule in Clayton's Case (1) was very much considered in Re Hallett's Estate (6) in 1880, by the Court of Appeal (SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and BAGGALLAY and THESIGER, L.JJ.). SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (13 Ch.D. at p. 728):

"It is a very convenient rule, and I have nothing to say against it unless there is evidence either of agreement to the contrary or of circumstances from which a contrary intention must be presumed, and then, of course, that which is a mere presumption of law gives way to those other considerations."

BAGGALLAY, L.J., observed (ibid. at pp. 738, 739):

"Clayton's Case (1) was decided upon the principle that, in the absence of any express intention to the contrary, or of special circumstances from which such an intention could be implied, the appropriation of drawings out to the payments in, as adopted in that case, represented what must be presumed to have been the intention of the parties concerned, and, so viewed, the decision is quite consistent with the like presumption being rebutted or modified in another case in which the circumstances were such as to negative any intention to make such an appropriation of the drawings out to the payments in."

If the rule in Clayton's Case (1), which certainly at one time was considered to be a rule of such force and stringency as to interfere even with the equity of the following trust money into the bank account of a fraudulent trustee, is to be accepted with this qualification, and if an account stated between the parties is only evidence of appropriation of payments, it seems to me that, in order to determine the question at issue on this appeal, it is necessary to consider the circumstances of the case more closely than they were considered in the courts below. If you look at the position of the parties when the payment of the £900 was made, and the purpose for which the statement of account of Aug. 22, 1894, was sent, and examine the terms of the account itself, and the letter which accompanied it, it is, I think, impossible to suppose that the appellants could have intended to appropriate the £900 in a manner inconsistent with the rights which they asserted when they arrested the Mecca. It is, I think, equally impossible to suppose that they could have intended to renounce or waive their privilege of election. It is quite clear that when the bills were dishonoured the appellants were alive to their rights. They intimated very distinctly that they were prepared to seize both the vessels which were then lying at Suez. It was this threat that brought the company to terms. For some time the appellants could not obtain any satisfactory assurance from H. E. Moss & Co. The Hamidieh Co. put them off with empty promises. But at last the company got frightened, and on June 15, 1894, they wrote to H. E. Moss & Co., referring to the steamers and saying,

“As Messrs. Cory Bros. & Co. threaten to take proceedings against both the above named steamers if they do not promptly receive from us a satisfactory assurance that they will soon be paid, we beg you will not delay to give them such an assurance, otherwise the results will be very detrimental to the Hamidieh Co. and to our Mr. Constantine A. Theodoridi.”

So on June 22, Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co. gave the required assurance, on an undertaking by the appellants that they would not, for three months from that date, arrest any of the property of the Hamidieh Co., either in this country or abroad, unless meantime the amounts to be received from the salvage claims on underwriters should fall short of the amount of the bills held by them.

After that I rather doubt whether it would have been right for the company to try to steal a march upon their creditors by attempting to appropriate the money so as to release any part of their property. However that may be, the receipt which was given on Aug. 15, seem to show that the intention of the parties was that at the expiration of the period of grace the appellants should be remitted to their original rights, giving credit in general account for any sums received. Again, it seems to me that the letter of Aug. 22, conveyed a distinct intimation that the appellants would exercise their rights unless the balance were paid. It was for the purpose of showing what the balance was, and for no other purpose whatever, that the account was made up. It is impossible to suppose that the appellants, while looking forward to exercising their rights in case of default, would have made up an account with the intention of releasing one of the two vessels when they could not tell upon which of the two they might be able to lay their hands.

Then it seems to me that the very frame of the account affords some indication that it was not intended to apply the payment in discharge of the first three bills, for the interest on those bills is the very last item in the account. If the intention had been to discharge bills which carried interest, it surely would have been intended at the same time to discharge the accrued interest on which no interest would be payable. If the company thought that the appellants intended to discharge the Mecca bills, why did they not, when they received the account, ask for their return? I cannot help thinking that, if they had made such a request, they would have received a very indignant reply. The result might have been the return of the cheque and immediate seizure of the two vessels, which would hardly have answered the company's purpose. In the result I am of opinion that it was competent for the appellants to arrest the Mecca in October, 1894, and at that time to appropriate the money which they had received from H. E. Moss & Co. to the Medina bills. I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Kay and Rigby, L.JJ.), October 29, 1895]

Warranty—Damages—Remoteness of damage—Defective chain supplied to plaintiffs by defendant—Compensation paid by plaintiffs to injured workman—Right of plaintiffs to recover amount paid from defendants.

The defendant supplied the plaintiffs with a chain, to be used by them as stevedores in discharging a cargo, as being reasonably fit for that purpose. In fact the chain was defective with the result that it broke in use and caused a workman of the plaintiffs to be injured. The defect might have been discovered by the plaintiffs by the exercise of reasonable care. The plaintiffs paid £125 which was a reasonable and proper amount in settlement of their workman's claim for compensation and then claimed that sum from the defendant as damages for breach of warranty.

Held: the injury to the workman and the plaintiffs' liability for such injury was a natural consequence of the defendant's breach of warranty and one which it was reasonable to suppose would be within the contemplation of the parties, and, therefore, the damage not being too remote, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover £125 from the defendant.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of CHARLES, J., reported [1895] 1 Q.B. 857, at the trial without a jury, at Leeds, in an action by the plaintiffs to recover £125 as damages for breach of warranty.

The plaintiffs were stevedores at West Hartlepool, and the defendant was the owner of the steamship Wenby. In August, 1894, the plaintiffs undertook to discharge a cargo of deals from the Wenby, and, in accordance with the custom of the port, the defendant promised to provide all necessary and proper derricks, cranes, chains, winches, and other gearing reasonably fit for the purpose of discharging the cargo. The defendant supplied a chain which was so defective that, while it was being used in discharging the cargo, it broke and injured a workman employed by the plaintiffs. The injured workman thereupon commenced an action against the plaintiffs, claiming damages, under s. 1 and s. 2 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that there was a defect in the condition of the chain which the plaintiffs might have discovered by the exercise of reasonable care. The plaintiffs did not defend the action, and paid the workman £125 as compensation. It was admitted by the defendant that there had been a breach by him of the implied warranty that the chain should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied; and, by the plaintiffs, that they might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the defect in the chain. The defendant admitted that the settlement of the action by the workman against the plaintiffs was reasonable and proper.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and H. Gawan Taylor for the defendant.

Robson, Q.C., and Meynell for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—We have no doubt whatever about this case. This action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant for damages for breach of a warranty given by the defendant to the plaintiffs. It was admitted that the warranty had been given. It was an implied warranty, but that makes no difference; it was a warranty. The plaintiffs say that the defendant warranted that a chain would be sound and efficient for the work which it had to do, and for the purpose for which it was to be used, and that the defendant knew the purpose for which it was to be used. The defendant admits that there has been a breach of that warranty. That is sufficient to support the action. There was a contract, and a breach of that contract, and the plaintiffs are entitled to nominal damages at least. The plaintiffs say that, in this case, they have suffered more than nominal damage. They say that the defendant warranted this chain, which was to be used in their business as stevedores, knowing the way in which it would be used by their, the plaintiffs', workmen, and knowing that, if an inefficient chain were supplied, it would give way, and that the natural consequence would be that the workmen would be injured. Therefore, the almost certain result of a breach of such a warranty would be that the plaintiffs' workmen would be hurt and would be entitled to sue the plaintiffs for damages. The plaintiffs took the chain from the defendant with that warranty, and used it for the intended purpose by means of their workmen. The chain broke because of the breach of that warranty. Then the natural and inevitable result of the breaking of the chain was that a workman was injured. The result to the plaintiffs was that the workman would sue them and recover damages if there had been any want of care on their part in allowing the chain to be used. The plaintiffs did not examine the chain before using it, because of the warranty given by the defendant upon which they had a right to rely. For that reason the plaintiffs were guilty of want of care. That was the natural result of the warranty which had been given by the defendant, and of the breach thereof.

What is the rule as to damages? There has been a contract of warranty, and a breach of that contract, and the plaintiffs sue in respect of that breach. In this case the result has been a peculiar kind of damage, and the question is whether that damage is too remote. What is the test of that? It is given by CHARLES, J., in his judgment, where he says:

"The only question which I have to determine is whether the damage done to the workman, and which he could only recover from the plaintiffs by showing want of care in them, may nevertheless be regarded as the natural consequence of the defendant's breach of contract; or, in other words, a consequence which might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties."

A If they had considered the matter with any care, they ought to have contemplated such a consequence. If, therefore, the parties in this case had so considered the matter, is it not reasonable to suppose that it would be within their contemplation that, if injury resulted to the plaintiff's workmen, the defendant would have to pay? I prefer the opinion of MARTIN, B., expressed in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co. (1), to that of the Scottish judges in Ovington v. M'Vicar (2). I think that the view of MARTIN, B., was correct, and I adopt it. I am of opinion, therefore, that it is clear, in this case, that the damage for which the plaintiffs are suing is not too remote from the breach of warranty by the defendant. The plaintiffs owed no duty to the defendant, but to their own workmen only, and the defendant cannot rely upon the plaintiffs' negligence. I think that the judgment of CHARLES, J., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

G
KAY, L.J.—This was an action brought to recover damages for a breach of warranty. The warranty, and the breach thereof, are not denied. The defendant supplied to the plaintiffs a chain to be used by them as stevedores in the work of unloading ships. The chain was defective; it broke while it was being used; and it injured a workman of the plaintiffs who was using it. The stevedores relied upon the defendant's warranty, and did not examine the chain before using it. The workman, therefore, had a remedy against two persons. He might have sued the defendant, according to Heaven v. Pender (3); or he might have sued his employers because the chain was defective and they were negligent in not discovering that fact. The workman commenced an action against the stevedores, and they compromised the action by paying £125. It is admitted, and must be assumed, that £125 was a proper sum to pay as compensation, and, if the action had been brought against the present defendant, the workman would have recovered the same amount. The stevedores then brought this action against the defendant. They say that there was a breach of his warranty that the chain would be efficient for the purpose for which it was supplied; and that the damages are not nominal, because, by reason of the defect in the chain and their want of care in not examining it, they have had to pay £125 to their workman. The defence is that the plaintiffs would not have had to pay that money if they had not been negligent in not discovering the defect, and that they became liable to their workman, not solely on account of the defect in the chain, but also on account of their negligence in not discovering the defect. If the damages recovered from the plaintiffs by their workman were more than the workman could have recovered from the defendant if he had sued him, perhaps the measure of damages in this case would not be the same.

I
In my opinion it is a most important fact, that the amount is the same. Suppose that this accident had not happened to a workman but to the plaintiffs themselves. Could they not have recovered against the defendant? It is clear that they could, and could have recovered the same damages. I do not lay down, or assent to, the proposition that the damages recovered against an employer are the measure of the damages recoverable against the defendant in cases of this kind. But here it is admitted that the amount would be the proper measure of damages if the action by the workman had been brought against the defendant, and it is, therefore, the proper measure in this action. The plaintiffs are not to be defeated in this action because they relied on the defendant's warranty. There was no negligence as between the plaintiffs and the defendant; there was no duty to examine the chain, for there was a warranty. I think that this was, within the well-known rule, a damage which fairly resulted from the defendant's breach of warranty, and one which must have been within the contemplation of both parties, viz., that if the chain was not efficient, injury might accrue to the plaintiffs' workmen.

As to the cases which have been cited, they are all distinguishable except two. In Wrightup v. Chamberlain (4) it was held that the costs of improperly defending an action were not recoverable. In this case such costs could not have been recovered if the plaintiffs had defended the action by their workman. In Kiddle v.

Lovett (5) the employer paid money to his workman when there had been no negligence; that was a gift, because there was no liability. In Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co. (1) MARTIN, B., distinctly expressed an opinion that, in a case like this, the damages recovered by the workman were the proper measure of damages. The only other authority is Ovington v. M'Vicar (2), in which the Scottish judges expressed a different opinion. I prefer the opinion of MARTIN, B. I think that the judgment of CHARLES, J., was perfectly right, and I concur in the reasoning of that decision. This appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This was an action for damages for breach of warranty. It is admitted that, under the circumstances, there was a warranty that reasonable care should be taken to supply plant fit and proper for the purpose for which it was supplied. It is clear that no such care was taken. The plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled, as between themselves and the defendant, to rely upon the warranty as to the efficiency of the chain. It is true that, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, the employers would be liable to their workmen if they were negligent. In an action by a workman against his employers it would be no answer to say that they had a warranty from the person who supplied the plant. Negligence is the absence of due diligence. The defendant is trying to set up the absence of due diligence on the part of the plaintiffs. That was an abuse of due diligence towards their workmen and not towards the defendant. The defendant had warranted the efficiency of the chain. The question in this case is whether the damages claimed were reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when the warranty was given. That is clear, because the workman of the plaintiffs had a right to sue the defendant himself if he chose to do so. As to the authorities, I am not satisfied that, in Ovington v. M'Vicar (2), the Scottish judges intended to lay down any different rule. If they did so, I do not agree with their view, but with the view of MARTIN, B., expressed in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co. (1). I think that the decision of CHARLES, J., was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

The levying of a distress by a landlord for arrears of rent is not such a waiver of his right for forfeiture as to prevent him from bringing an action of ejectment under s. 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

Appeal by the plaintiff, the landlord, in an action for possession of a house and for £80 14s. 4d. arrears of rent, from a decision of MATHEW, J., at the trial of the action without a jury in which the landlord obtained judgment for the arrears of rent but the tenant was given judgment on the claim for possession on the ground that by distraining the landlord had waived his right of re-entry.

G

By a lease dated Jan. 14, 1884, the landlord leased a house at No. 19, New Oxford Street, to the tenant for the term of twenty-one years, at the yearly rent of £130, payable on the usual quarter days. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant to pay the agreed rent, and there was a proviso for re-entry if the rent should remain unpaid for twenty-one days after it had become due, whether demanded or not. The quarter's rents which became due at Ladyday, at Midsummer, and at Michaelmas, 1894, remained unpaid, and on Nov. 22, 1894, the plaintiff put in a distress upon the demised premises. This distress, after payment of charges, realised only a very small sum, and a balance still remained due to the landlord in respect of the three quarters' rent of £80 14s. 4d.; viz., more than half a year's rent still remained due. On Nov. 26 the landlord issued the writ in this action, claiming possession of the premises and arrears of rent.

July 30, 1895. The following judgments were read.

KAY, L.J.—Section 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, seems to me to mean that a landlord who has power to re-enter for nonpayment of rent may recover in ejectment, notwithstanding that he has distrained for such rent if such distress did not produce sufficient to pay such rent, but left half a year's rent still due. In this case the landlord had a right of re-entry, if any quarter's rent should be in arrear for twenty-one days. Three quarters' rent were due; the landlord distrained. The distress was not sufficient to pay one quarter, therefore, when he brought the action half a year's rent was due, and the statute applies and enables him to recover notwithstanding the distress. This was the construction put upon the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, in Brewer d. Lord Onslow v. Eaton (1).

It was argued that putting in the distress waived the right of re-entry at common law, and that the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, does not apply where a distress has actually been levied. The material words of s. 210 are

"if it shall be . . . proved upon the trial . . . that half a year's rent was due before the said writ was served, and that no sufficient distress was to be found on the demised premises countervailing the arrears then due."

How could it be said that no sufficient distress was to be found without distraining? Goods on the premises are not a distress until they are distrained, and the landlord cannot tell what is to be found on the premises without putting in a distress. He has no right to enter merely to see what goods are there. The statute evidently contemplates an actual distress, and expressly authorises the ejectment under the power for re-entry, notwithstanding such distress, if half a year's rent remains due. But reliance was placed upon the language used by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in his judgment in Cotesworth v. Spokes (2). In that case a lessor having a power of re-entry distrained for three quarters' rent, and after realising the distress less than half a year's rent remained due. He then brought ejectment, but it was held that, as half a year's rent was not due, the case was not within the statute, and the action was not maintainable. The power of re-entry by the terms of the lease was, if a quarter's rent should be in arrear for twenty-one days. The three quarters' rent were due at Michaelmas, 1860, i.e., September 29. The distress was put in on Oct. 2, that is within twenty-one days from that date. Ejectment was brought on Nov. 2, after the expiration of twenty-one days, but part having been paid by the distress there was not a right of re-entry for half a year's rent at the end of the twenty-one days after Michaelmas, and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said that the distress was a waiver because it was for the rent up to Michaelmas, as to the last quarter of which there was no right of re-entry at the time of the distress, because the twenty-one days had not expired. But if the distress had been confined to the rent due at Midsummer there would have been no waiver, because as to that the forfeiture had actually occurred.

In the present case it is unnecessary to express any opinion as to this part of the judgment which was not the ground of the decision before us. Two quarters' rent and part of a third were due on Sept. 29, and the distress was put in on Nov. 22, more than twenty-one days after the last of the three quarters' rent became due. Therefore, that point does not arise.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.— This is an action of ejectment by a landlord against his tenant, and the circumstances are these. In 1884 the landlord demised to the tenant, 19, New Oxford Street, for the term of twenty-one years, at the rent of £130 payable on the usual quarter days, with a proviso for re-entry if the rent remained unpaid for twenty-one days after it became due, whether demanded or not. On Mar. 25, 1894, the quarter's rent became due and remained unpaid, and at Midsummer and at Michaelmas, 1894, two further quarters' rent also became due and remained unpaid. On Nov. 22, 1894, the landlord distrained, but was only able to realise such an amount as left more than half a year's rent still due; and he thereupon on Nov. 26, 1894, issued a writ in ejectment against the tenant. MATHEW, J., has held that by distraining upon Nov. 22, 1894, the landlord had waived the forfeiture, and he has given judgment for the tenant. It is conceded by the landlord that at common law the distress operated as a waiver of the forfeiture which occurred on the nonpayment of the rent, and the question is whether, notwithstanding this distress, the landlord, by reason of the provisions of s. 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, is entitled to maintain this action.

A This section, which is a re-enactment of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 2, enacts :

B “In all cases between landlord and tenant, as often as it shall happen that one half-year’s rent shall be in arrear and the landlord . . . hath right by law to re-enter for the nonpayment thereof, such landlord . . . may without any formal demand or re-entry, serve a writ in ejectment . . . and . . . if it . . . be proved upon the trial . . . that half a year’s rent was due before the writ was served and that no sufficient distress was to be found on the demised premises, countervailing the arrears then due, and that the lessor had power to re-enter, then and in every such case the lessor shall recover judgment and execution, in the same manner as if the rent in arrear had been legally demanded, and a re-entry made. . . .”

C To bring himself within the section the landlord must prove (i) the relationship of landlord and tenant; (ii) that he has by law the right to re-enter for nonpayment of rent; (iii) that having distrained he has been thereby unable to satisfy the rent due; and (iv) that there was half a year’s rent due when he served the writ of ejectment. Upon proof of these by the landlord, then in my judgment the section enacts that he may proceed against his tenant and recover in ejectment, whether he had legally demanded the rent or not. But to avail himself of the section the above-mentioned four requisitions must be proved.

E That this is the true reading of the section appears from Brewer v. Lord Onslow v. Eaton (1) in 1783, where LORD MANSFIELD and the Court of King’s Bench upon the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 2 (an equivalent section to s. 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852), held that, though at common law the distress would have operated as a waiver of the forfeiture incurred by the nonpayment of the rent, yet in a case which came within the statute it was not so, for the statute required the landlord to prove on the trial that no sufficient distress was to be found on the premises countervailing the arrear due, and that a distress which it was necessary for the landlord to make in order to complete the title given him by the statute was no waiver. It is said, however, that this case was overruled by the Court of Common Pleas in Cotesworth v. Spokes (2); but this is not so. That case decided that, for a landlord to bring himself within the section, he must prove that half a year’s rent was in arrear at the time of the service of the writ. A passage at the end of the judgment (which was delivered by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.) was pressed upon us to show that the forfeiture was waived in the present case by what the landlord had done; but in my judgment, though the passage is hard to understand, it does not decide this, and I must point out that it was not competent for the Court of Common Pleas to overrule the Court of King’s Bench, and it is not correct to say that it has done so. It should be noted that in Cotesworth v. Spokes (2) the distress was within the twenty-one days, which is not so in the present case; but be this as it may, in my judgment the case leaves that of Brewer v. Lord Onslow v. Eaton (1) untouched upon the point now under consideration. The Court of King’s Bench put the true construction upon the section, which has apparently been acted upon for over one hundred years, and as the landlord has proved the requirements of s. 210, he is entitled to judgment, and this appeal must be allowed and judgment given for the landlord with costs here and below.

I LORD ESHER, M.R. I agree with the judgments that have been read.

A April 30, 1895.—The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question which has been submitted to us in this case is whether an auditor of this bank can be properly regarded as an officer within the meaning of s. 10 of the Companies Winding-up Act, 1890. That section runs thus :

B “Where in the course of the winding-up of a company under the Companies Acts it appears that any person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, or any past or present director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, has misapplied or retained, or become liable or accountable for, any moneys or property of the company, or been guilty of
C any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the court may, on the application of the official receiver, or of the liquidator of the company, or of any creditor or contributory of the company, examine into the conduct of such promoter, director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, and compel him to repay any moneys or restore any property so misapplied or retained, or for which he has become liable or accountable, together
D with interest after such rate as the court thinks just, or to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retainer, misfeasance, or breach of trust as the court thinks just.”

It is urged by counsel for Mr. Theobald that the auditor of a company is not an officer within the meaning of that section. It appears to me that, in order to
E decide that question, we must examine and consider what an auditor is, how he is appointed, by whom he is paid, and what his duties are. This company is a banking company, and the auditor is required to be appointed under the Companies Act, 1879. That Act is one of the group of Acts which are usually referred to as the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890. Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1879 runs thus :

F “Once at least in every year the accounts of every banking company registered after the passing of this Act as a limited company shall be examined by an auditor or auditors, who shall be elected annually by the company in general meeting.”

[His LORDSHIP also read the other sub-sections, and pointed out that they referred
G to the term “office” of any auditor.] Section 8 says that the auditor shall sign a balance-sheet and so on. Reading s. 7 alone it seems to me impossible to deny that for some purposes and to some extent an auditor is an officer of the company. He is appointed by the company, he is paid by the company, and his position is described in the section as that of an officer of the company. He is not a servant of the directors. On the contrary, he is appointed by the company to check the
H directors, and for some purposes and to some extent it seems to me quite impossible to say that he is not an officer of the company.

So much for the Act. If we pass to the articles of association of this company we find that there are some which are important. Article 2 (which is the definition clause) says that “auditors and secretary” mean those respective officers from time to time of the company. Article 73 runs thus :

I “Every director, auditor, manager, secretary, and other officer shall be indemnified by the company from all losses and expenses incurred by them respectively in or about the discharge of their respective duties except such as happen from their own respective wilful acts or defaults.”

Article 107 (which relates to the auditing) says that the accounts of the company shall be from time to time examined, and so on. Then Article 108 runs thus :

“No person shall be eligible as an auditor who is not a shareholder of the company, or who is interested otherwise than as a shareholder or customer in any transaction of the company, and no director or officer of the company shall during his continuance in office be eligible as an auditor.’’

Then :

“auditors shall be appointed at the ordinary meetings of the company each year by the shareholders present thereat, and shall only hold their offices until the ordinary meetings in every year after their appointment. Retiring auditors shall be eligible for re-election. No person not being a retiring auditor shall be eligible to the office of auditor unless notice of an intention to propose him at an ordinary meeting be given at least fourteen days, and not more than one month before the meeting, and a copy of such notice shall be posted up at the office during the five days next before the meeting. The remuneration of the auditors shall be determined, and may be from time to time varied, by general meetings.’’

By art. 121 :

“Every director, manager, auditor, trustee, member of a committee, officer, servant, agent, accountant, or other person employed in the business of the company shall before entering upon his duties sign a declaration pledging himself to observe a strict secrecy. . . .”

I do not know that those articles carry the matter very much further than the sections of the Act of 1879, to which I have alluded, and my observations upon the articles and that Act are those which I have already made, viz., that for some purposes and to some extent at all events an auditor is an officer appointed by the company, although in no sense a servant of the directors.

Then it is said that for all that an auditor is not an officer of the company within the meaning of s. 10 of the Act of 1890. It is put in this way, that an officer within the meaning of s. 10 is an officer who in some way or other has control over the assets of the company. It is quite obvious that this section applies to something more than the misapplication of assets. Misapplication or retainer, or becoming liable or accountable for the assets, is provided for by the first part of the section. But, in addition to that there is mention made of misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, and, with reference to that, provision is made for compensating the company, not by the words which authorise the court to compel the person guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust to repay any moneys or restore any property, but by the words

“to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retainer, misfeasance, or breach of trust as the court thinks just.”

I know nothing about the charges against this auditor upon the facts. But I presume that an auditor, whose business it is to audit accounts and sign balance-sheets, knows perfectly well that the balance-sheets so signed by him will be acted upon, and that, if the balance-sheets show profits properly divisible as dividend, a dividend will be declared. Suppose that he purposely and fraudulently prepares and signs a balance-sheet showing profits divisible when there are none. It appears to me that that is a distinct misfeasance in that sense within the meaning of s. 10 of the Act of 1890, leading to and intended to lead to a misapplication of the assets. Such a misfeasance I have not the slightest doubt will be a misfeasance within the meaning of the section. Although that does not show that he is an officer of the company, yet, having regard to the articles of association of this company and the provisions I have just referred to, I do not see how it can be said that as a matter of law this auditor is not an officer of the company, and cannot be liable for misfeasance. In my opinion, he is an officer, and may be within the mischief contemplated by s. 10.

It is said that that is very hard upon persons who are auditors of companies, and that, if they are guilty of negligence, fraud, or misconduct, the proper way of

A proceeding against them is by means of an action. But, suppose that an action were brought against an auditor upon the ground that the accounts had been fraudulently audited, how could that be possibly tried by a jury? It would demand and would necessitate a prolonged investigation of the accounts, and no one who has any experience of trial by jury would for a moment pretend that it could be so tried. Therefore, it must be referred to some other tribunal. The point made, that you are going to deprive an auditor of his constitutional right does not apply, and it appears to me that that objection fails. We are not prepared to say, and cannot say, that the auditor of a company in a case like this is not an officer of a company within s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether an auditor, such as the auditor in the present case, is an officer within the true meaning of s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. I do not propose to read that section again, which has already been read. But it is to be observed, in respect of this section, that it does not create any new rights; it merely gives a very summary mode of procedure in enforcing rights already existing. If it were not for the word “misfeasance” in s. 10 I should not have thought that an auditor, such as the auditor in the present case, came within the meaning of that section. I should have thought that the section, if that word had been absent from it, was rather directed against those who had to carry out the business and purposes of the company; who had the control over the assets of the company; who had the conduct of the business; and who might have the assets or the property of the company in their hands which they might apply, retain, or restore. But I find the word “misfeasance,” and, as I understand the word “misfeasance” in this section, it means a breach of duty. If it means a breach of duty, one can quite understand a breach of duty which might be committed by an auditor. For instance, he might, in collusion with his directors, prepare a false statement of accounts which would involve a misapplication of the assets. In such a case it seems to me that that would be one of the mischiefs which this section was intended to prevent. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that an auditor such as that of a banking company is an officer within the meaning of that section, and I am fortified in that view by the words of s. 7 (1) of the Companies Act, 1879, because it seems to me that that section recognises the auditor of a banking company as an officer. The sub-section says: “If any casual vacancy occurs in the office of auditor,” and throughout the section seems to contemplate that the auditor is an officer of the company. That, I repeat, fortifies the view that I have formed with regard to s. 10, and I am also confirmed in that view by the fact that the articles of association of this very banking company recognise the auditor as an officer.

There was a case referred to, namely, Re Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society (1) which came before CAVE and HENN COLLINS, JJ. That was not a case of an auditor. That was the case of a solicitor. It was not the case of a banking company, but of a building society. And it is true that CAVE, J., in the course of his judgment, says (71 L.T. at p. 407):

“It seems to me that merely because he was appointed solicitor to the society, without more, the solicitor does not become an officer of the society any more than it has been held that a banker does if he is appointed banker to the society, or a broker if he is appointed broker to the society, or the auditor if he is appointed auditor to the society.”

I do not think that the attention of CAVE, J., was drawn to the word “misfeasance” in s. 10 of the Act of 1890. But, however that may have been, that, as I have pointed out already, was the case, not of an auditor, but of a solicitor. It may be again said that the section of the Act of 1879, which relates to the auditor of a banking company, would not relate in the same way to a solicitor. The articles of association in this case, moreover, recognise the auditor as an officer. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the auditor of this banking company was an officer A within the true meaning of s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

KAY, L.J.—I come to the same conclusion. But I wish to guard myself against B being understood to hold that in every case of a joint-stock company the auditor employed by the joint-stock company is an officer of the company. I do not at present hold that opinion. I can quite conceive that there may be one or two cases of a joint-stock company who call in an auditor to make a particular audit where the auditor called in could not be properly treated as an officer of the company.
But we have got to deal in this case with a joint-stock banking limited company whose duties in respect of having their accounts audited are prescribed by the Companies Act, 1879. It will be observed, on looking at s. 7 of that Act, that the auditor is to be appointed by the company in general meeting. Section 7 (1) says C that once at the least in every year the accounts of every banking company registered after the passing of this Act as a limited company shall be examined by an auditor or auditors who shall be elected annually by the company in general meeting. So that the election is not, like the election of the ordinary officers of the society, delegated to the directors of the company. It is prescribed by statute that there shall in this case be an auditor elected by the company in general meeting. D

Then I find, turning to the articles of association of this company, that they recognise distinctly their duty, and by the interpretation clause of their articles they do define expressly that the auditor of this company shall be an officer of this company. The first of the articles says that the term "auditors and secretary" means those respective officers from time to time of the company. Again, we find in art. 73 a recognition of the fact that auditors duly appointed by the company are E officers of the company. Then come the articles which speak of the duties of auditors (viz., arts. 107 and 108). Some comments were made with regard to the words, and the language of art. 108, which provides that no director or officer of the company shall during his continuance in office be eligible as auditor. It was said that that shows plainly that an auditor is to be, not an officer of the company, but somebody who is not an officer. I do not read it in that sense. That is a copy F of the language of the Act of 1879, which provides in s. 7 (2), that "a director or officer of the company shall not be capable of being elected an auditor of such company." Here the auditor is treated as an officer of the company. The company provide also in their articles that the auditors shall not hold any other office in the company. At the same time, I take art. 108 not to contradict that which has been said in the earlier part of the articles, that an auditor of the company is an officer G of the company, but merely to provide, as the statute provides, that while he is an auditor he shall not hold any other office in the company. The object of that provision is, that he might not hold some other office the duties of which might bias him in his conduct as an auditor. Therefore, to prevent the danger of that, it is provided by the statute, and repeated by the articles, that he cannot hold at the same time any other office of the company. That seems to me to reconcile these H articles with the statute; and I come to the conclusion that in this case the company in its constitution recognised the necessity of having auditors duly appointed under the statute of 1879, and made these provisions that auditors so appointed should be treated by this company as being officers of the company.

In the face of that, it seems to me impossible to hold that the auditors are not I officers of the company. Whether they are officers within s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, or not, seems to be almost concluded when you find that this company did appoint its auditors as officers of the company. For, after all, all that the section provides is a convenient mode of dealing with, among other things, the misapplication of the funds of the company by its officers. On the other hand, it provides also for misfeasance (misfeasance other than misapplication of the funds or property of the company) which may lead to an injury and damage to the company, and is to be met, not by replacing the misappropriated funds, but, as the section says, by compensation to the company. The words "misfeasance" and "compensation," as used in that section, seem to me to be clearly correlative, and when the section speaks of the misfeasance of an officer of the company it must mean—looking to the collocated words—misfeasance other than the misapplication or misappropriation of the funds or property of the company. To remedy that misfeasance the power which the section gives requires that persons convicted of misfeasance shall make compensation to the company. As has been said by LINDLEY, L.J., the possibility of misfeasance by an auditor might produce very considerable damage and injury to the company of which he was auditor. Therefore, it seems to me that he does come within the section, and that he can be made liable for misfeasance and be obliged to make compensation to the company. I, therefore, think that that must be our ruling.

Company—Auditor—Duty—Ascertainment and statement to shareholders of true financial position of company—Exercise of reasonable care and skill.

It is no part of the duty of an auditor of a company to give advice, either to directors or shareholders, as to what they ought to do. He has nothing to do with the prudence or imprudence of making loans with or without security or whether the business of the company is being conducted prudently or imprudently, profitably or unprofitably. It is nothing to him whether dividends are properly or improperly declared, provided he discharges his own duty to the shareholders which is to ascertain and state the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit.

To ascertain the true position of the company the auditor must examine the books of the company, taking reasonable care to ascertain that they do show the true position. Assuming the books to be so kept as to show the true position, the auditor has to frame a balance sheet showing that position according to the books and to certify that the balance sheet presented is correct in that sense.

But an auditor is not bound to do more than exercise reasonable care and skill in making inquiries and investigations. He is not an insurer. He does not guarantee that the books do correctly show the true position of the company's affairs. He does not even guarantee that his balance sheet is accurate according to the books of the company, for that would render him responsible for error on his part even if he were deceived without any want of reasonable care on his part, e.g., by the fraudulent concealment from him of a book. Even in the case of suspicion he is not bound to exercise more than reasonable care and skill. What is reasonable care in any particular case must depend on the circumstances of that case. An auditor is justified in acting on the opinion of an expert where special knowledge is required.

Circumstances in which an auditor was held to have failed to discharge his duty to the shareholders in certifying and laying before them a true balance sheet, and, consequently, to have been guilty of misfeasance within s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 [see now the Companies Act, 1948, s. 333 (1)] and ordered to pay damages.

Appeal by the auditor from an order of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., made on a summons taken out in the winding-up of the London & General Bank, Ltd., by the official receiver and liquidator under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 [see now the Companies Act, 1948, s. 333 (1)], seeking to make certain directors and the auditor of the company liable for moneys paid as dividends on the capital of the company, on the ground that they were not paid out of profits and were a misapplication of the company's funds. The summons also asked a similar declaration against the auditor of the company in respect of dividends declared on the ground that he was the auditor who certified and reported the balance-sheets which were laid before the company purporting to show profits in excess of the sum paid as dividends. The summons also claimed that the directors and the auditor were liable to make good to the assets of the company sums said to have been advanced without proper security. It was decided by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., that the directors and auditor were liable.

Aug. 6, 1895. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by Mr. Theobald, one of the auditors of the London & General Bank, Ltd., which is being wound-up, against an order made by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. By this order Mr. Theobald and the directors of the bank are declared jointly and severally liable to pay to the official receiver, as liquidator of the company, two sums of £5,946 12s. and £8,486 11s., being respectively the amounts of dividends declared and paid by the bank for the years 1890 and 1891. The grounds on which this order was made on Mr. Theobald are that these dividends were paid out of capital, and that that payment was made pursuant to resolutions of the shareholders based upon recommendations of the directors of the bank and upon balance-sheets prepared and certified by Mr. Theobald, which did not truly represent the financial position of the company. Mr. Theobald's appeal was supported by arguments to this effect: (i) That Mr. Theobald was not an "officer" of the company within the meaning of s. 10 of the Act of 1890; (ii) that the balance-sheets and certificates given by Mr. Theobald were in accordance with the books of the bank, and that his duty as auditor was confined to framing balance-sheets which showed the position of the bank as disclosed by its books; (iii) that the dividends in question were not really paid out of capital, and that, however improvident and reckless it may have been to pay them, Mr. Theobald as auditor is not legally responsible for that payment; (iv) that, even if Mr. Theobald as auditor failed adequately to discharge his duty, and even if the dividends were paid out of capital, his failure to discharge his duty was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the wrongful payment of the dividends, and that he consequently is not legally liable to make good the amount so paid; (v) that at any rate the order is wrong in declaring him jointly and severally liable with the directors to repay the dividends in question.

The first of these contentions was argued and decided last April, and this court then held that an auditor of a banking company governed by the Companies Act, 1879, and by such articles as regulated the present company, was an "officer" of the company within the meaning of s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and was liable to have proceedings taken against him under that section [see p. 948 ante]. This point having been then decided was, of course, not again raised, and nothing further need be said about it. It remains, however, to consider what the duties of an auditor are as respects banking companies governed by the Companies Act, 1879, and by such articles as regulated this particular company. It will be convenient to do this before examining the facts relied upon by the liquidator, as rendering Mr. Theobald liable to make good the dividends which he has been ordered to pay. The duties of the auditors in this case were governed by s. 7 of the Companies Act, 1879. By sub-s. (1) of that section:

"Once at the least in every year the accounts of every banking company registered after the passing of this Act as a limited company shall be examined by an auditor or auditors, who shall be elected annually by the company in general meeting."

Sub-s. (2) provides that a director or officer of the company should not be capable of being elected auditor. By sub-s. (5):

"Every auditor shall have a list delivered to him of all books kept by the company, and shall at all reasonable times have access to the books and accounts of the company; and any auditor may, in relation to such books and accounts examine the directors or any other officer of the company."

By sub-s. (6):

"The auditor or auditors shall make a report to the members on the accounts examined by him or them and on every balance-sheet laid before the company in general meeting during his or their tenure in office; and in every such report shall state whether, in his or their opinion, the balance-sheet referred to in the report is a full and fair balance-sheet properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs as shown by the books of the company." [See now Companies Act, 1948, s. 161 (2) (a), s. 162 (1) (3).]

The articles of association of the bank contained the following provisions. Clause 106 :

"At every ordinary meeting the directors shall lay before the meeting a balance-sheet showing the financial state of the company for the previous financial year, duly audited, and every such balance-sheet shall be accompanied by a report of the directors as to the state and condition of the company, and as to the amount which they recommend to be paid out of the profits by way of dividend or bonus to the shareholders, after allowing for any interim dividend which the directors may have declared, and any sum which they may have set aside under art. 116 hereof."

Clause 109 provided that (with certain specified exceptions) all auditors should be appointed at the ordinary meeting of the company in each year by the shareholders present thereat. By cl. 107,

"The accounts of the company shall be from time to time examined, and the correctness of the statements shall be from time to time ascertained by two or more auditors, in accordance with these presents."

By cl. 114 :

"The auditors shall be supplied with copies of the statement of accounts intended to be laid before the meeting, and it shall be their duty to examine the same, with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto."

These are the enactments and regulations which bear directly on the duties of the auditors, and although cl. 107 and 114 are in terms more explicit than s. 7 of the statute as regards the duty of the auditors to examine and ascertain the correctness of the statements laid before them, and of the accounts laid before the shareholders, yet it is tolerably plain from the language of s. 7 (5), that the articles add little, if anything, to the duty imposed on the auditors by the statute alone. In connection with these articles, and in order to save repetition, it should be stated that by the articles of this bank it is the duty of the directors, and not of the auditors, to recommend to the shareholders the amounts to be appropriated for dividends (cl. 98), and it is the duty of the directors to have proper accounts kept, so as to show the true state and condition of the company (cl. 103). Lastly, it is for the shareholders, but only on the recommendation of the directors, to declare a dividend (cl. 115).

It is impossible to read s. 7 of the Companies Act, 1879, without being struck with the importance of the enactment that the auditors are to be appointed by the shareholders, and are to report to them directly, and not to or through the directors [s. 159 (1) and s. 162 (1) of the Act of 1948]. The object of this enactment is obvious. It evidently is to secure to the shareholders independent and reliable information respecting the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit. The articles of this particular company are even more explicit on this point than the statute itself, and remove any possible ambiguity to which the language of the statute taken alone may be open if very narrowly criticised. It is no part of an auditor's duty to give advice, either to directors or shareholders, as to what they ought to do. An auditor has nothing to do with the prudence or imprudence of making loans with or without security. It is nothing to him whether the business of a company is being conducted prudently or imprudently, profitably or unprofitably. It is nothing to him whether dividends are properly or improperly declared, provided he discharges his own duty to the shareholders. His business is to ascertain and state the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit, and his duty is confined to that.

But then comes the question: How is he to ascertain that position? The answer is, by examining the books of the company. But he does not discharge his duty by doing this without inquiry and without taking any trouble to see that the books themselves show the company's true position. He must take reasonable care to ascertain that they do so. Unless he does this his audit would be worse than an idle farce. Assuming the books to be so kept as to show the true position of a company, the auditor has to frame a balance-sheet showing that position according to the books, and to certify that the balance-sheet presented is correct in that sense. But his first duty is to examine the books, not merely for the purpose of ascertaining what they do show, but also for the purpose of satisfying himself that they show the true financial position of the company. This is quite in accordance with the decision of STIRLING, J., in Leeds Estate Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd (1) (36 Ch.D. a p. 802). An auditor, however, is not bound to do more than exercise reasonable care and skill in making inquiries and investigations. He is not an insurer; he does not guarantee that the books do correctly show the true position of the company's affairs; he does not even guarantee that his balance-sheet is accurate according to the books of the company. If he did, he would be responsible for error on his part, even if he were himself deceived without any want of reasonable care on his part, say, by the fraudulent concealment of a book from him. His obligation is not so onerous as this. Such I take to be the duty of the auditor; he must be honest, i.e., he must not certify what he does not believe to be true, and he must take reasonable care and skill before he believes what he certifies is true. What is reasonable care in any particular case must depend upon the circumstances of that case. Where there is nothing to excite suspicion very little inquiry will be reasonably sufficient; and in practice I believe business men select a few cases at haphazard, see that they are right, and assume that others like them are correct also. Where suspicion is aroused more care is obviously necessary; but, still, an auditor is not bound to exercise more than reasonable care and skill, even in a case of suspicion, and he is perfectly justified in acting on the opinion of an expert where special knowledge is required.

Mr. Theobald's evidence satisfies me that he took the same view as myself of his duty in investigating the company's books and preparing his balance-sheet. He did not content himself with making his balance-sheet from the books without troubling himself about the truth of what they showed. He checked the cash, examined vouchers for payments, saw that the bills and securities entered in the books were held by the bank, took reasonable care to ascertain their value, and in one case obtained a solicitor's opinion on the validity of an equitable charge. I see no trace whatever of any failure by him in the performance of this part of his duty. It is satisfactory to find that the legal standard of duty is not too high for business purposes, and is recognised as correct by business men. The balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892 (i.e., for the year 1891) was accompanied by a report to the directors of the bank. Taking the balance-sheet, the certificate, and report together, Mr. Theobald stated to the directors the true financial position of the bank, and, if this report had been laid before the shareholders, Mr. Theobald would have completely discharged his duty to them. Unfortunately, however, this report was not laid before the shareholders, and it becomes necessary to consider the legal consequences to Mr. Theobald of this circumstance.

A person whose duty it is to convey information to others does not discharge that duty by simply giving them so much information as is calculated to induce them, or some of them, to ask for more. Information and means of information are by no means equivalent terms. Still, there may be circumstances under which information given in the shape of a printed document circulated among a large body of shareholders would, by its consequent publicity, be every injurious to their interests, and in such a case I am not prepared to say that an auditor would fail to discharge his duty if, instead of publishing his report in such a way as to ensure publicity, he made a confidential report to the shareholders, and invited their attention to it and told them where they could see it. The auditor is to make a report to the shareholders, but the mode of doing so and the form of the report are not prescribed. If, therefore, Mr. Theobald had laid before the shareholders the balance-sheet and profit and loss account, accompanied by a certificate in the form in which he first prepared it, he would perhaps have done enough under the peculiar circumstances of this case. I feel, however, the great danger of acting on such a principle, and in order not to be misunderstood I will add that an auditor who gives shareholders means of information instead of information respecting a company's financial position does so at his peril, and runs the very serious risk of being held judicially to have failed to discharge his duty.

In this case I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Theobald did fail to discharge his duty to the shareholders in certifying and laying before them the balance-sheet of February, 1892, without any reference to the report he laid before the directors, and with no other warning than is conveyed by the words, "The value of the assets as shown on the balance-sheet is dependent upon realisation." The most important asset on that balance-sheet is put down as "Loans to customers and other securities," £346,975, and on these a full and detailed report was made to the directors showing the very unsatisfactory state of these loans and securities, and it is impossible to read the oral evidence, the report of Balfour and Brock, dated Dec. 22, 1891, and the report of the auditor to the directors of Feb. 3, 1892, without coming to the conclusion that the entry of that large sum as a good asset without explanation was unjustifiable. It is a mere truism to say that the value of loans and securities depends on their realisation. We were told that a statement to that effect is so unusual in an auditor's certificate that the mere presence of those words was enough to excite suspicion. But, as already stated, the duty of an auditor is to convey information, not to arouse inquiry, and, although an auditor might infer from an unusual statement that something was seriously wrong, it by no means follows that ordinary people would have their suspicions aroused by a similar statement if, as in this case, its language expresses no more than any ordinary person would infer without it.

Mr. Theobald relies on the fact that he was induced to omit from his certificate all reference to the report which he made to the directors because Mr. Balfour, the chairman, promised to mention such report in his speech to the shareholders, and he did so. But, although Mr. Balfour twice alluded to the report, he did so in such a way as to avoid attracting attention to it. The second time he mentioned it was after a dividend had been declared and when a motion to re-appoint the auditors was before the meeting. The truth is, that not a word was said to convey to the shareholders the substance of the information contained in the report or to induce them to ask any question about it. The balance-sheet and profit and loss account were true and correct in this sense—that they were in accordance with the books. But they were, nevertheless, entirely misleading and misrepresented the real position of the company. Under these circumstances I am compelled to hold that Mr. Theobald failed to discharge his duty to the shareholders with respect to the balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892. Possibly he did not realise the extent of his duty to the shareholders as distinguished from the directors, and he unfortunately consented to leave the chairman to explain the true state of the company to the shareholders instead of doing so himself. The fact, however, remains, and cannot be got over, that the balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892, did not show the true position of the company at the end of 1891, and that this was owing to the omission by the auditor to lay before the shareholders the material information which he had obtained in the course of his employment as auditor of the company, and to which he called the attention of the directors.

But then it is contended that, even if this be so, there was after all no payment of dividend out of capital; and further that, even if there was, still that payment was not the natural or immediate result of Mr. Theobald's certificate and of the accounts which he prepared. Whether payment was made out of capital or not is a question of fact. The payment was professedly made out of profits made by the bank, by charging its customers with interest and commission on loans and discount. The books showed such profits, but the question is: Where did the money come from with which the dividends were paid? The money came from cash at the bankers' or in hand, but this cash could not be properly treated as profit, and the directors and auditors knew this perfectly well. This part of the case has been most carefully investigated by the learned judge whose decision we are reviewing, and, after attending closely to the observations of counsel on the reasonings and conclusions contained in the judgment appealed from, I see no reason whatever for dissenting from them. On the contrary, I entirely agree with the learned judge in saying that the profits for the year 1891 never really existed, except on paper, and that, to use his words, "whatever may be the right line to draw as to when profit not received may be carried to profit for the purpose of the annual revenue account, it is plain that there was no justification for so doing in the present case."

The real truth is that the assets of the bank were put down in the balance-sheet at far too high a figure, and this entry, though not misleading if explained (as it was to the directors), was seriously misleading in the absence of explanation. Mr. Theobald says that he regarded the assets of the bank as only locked up, but his report and the schedule to it go far beyond this. The value of the principal asset depended on the probability of the Balfour group of companies and some of the other large borrowers repaying their loans. They were financing each other; their indebtedness to the bank had increased largely during the year; the securities held by the bank for these loans were, to say the least, to a great extent of very doubtful value; and yet the total amount due to the bank in respect of these loans is inserted in the balance-sheet as a good asset, without any deduction and without a word of explanation to the shareholders. We know now that those assets have realised a comparatively small sum, and we were very properly warned against the danger of doing injustice by being wise after the event. But, disregarding the result of realisation, and attending only to what was known to the auditors in February, 1892, the entry in the balance-sheet of the sum of £346,975 as a good asset was wholly unjustifiable, unless explained.

We are now in a position to understand the true meaning of the passage contained in the auditors' report to the directors of Feb. 3, 1892, and which runs thus: "We cannot conclude without expressing our opinion unhesitatingly that no dividend should be paid this year." I find it impossible to treat this as a statement by the auditors that there are profits divisible among the shareholders, but that the auditors cannot recommend a dividend. I can only regard the passage as meaning that there are no funds out of which a dividend can properly be paid, and therefore, no dividend ought to be paid this year. A dividend of 7 per cent. was, nevertheless, recommended by the directors, and was resolved upon by the shareholders at a meeting furnished with the balance-sheet and profit and loss account certified by the auditors, and at which meeting the auditors were present, but silent. Not a word was said to inform the shareholders of the true state of affairs. It is idle to say that these accounts are so remotely connected with the payment of the dividend as to render the auditors legally irresponsible for such payment. The balance-sheet and account certified by the auditors, and showing a profit available for dividend, were, in my judgment, not the remote, but the real operating, cause of the resolution for the payment of the dividend which the directors improperly recommended. The auditors' accounts and certificate gave weight to such recommendation, and rendered it acceptable to the meeting. It was wholly unnecessary for the official receiver to call a shareholder to say that he was induced by the auditors' certificate to concur in the resolution to pay a dividend. As to this part of the case res ipsa loquitur.

A point was made that the form of the order was wrong. But there is nothing in this. Mr. Theobald could obviously be sued alone in an action at law for breach of his statutory duty as auditor, and for damages resulting from such breach of duty, and the measure of damages would be the sum which he has been ordered to pay. Whether a similar action at law could be maintained against him and the directors jointly is more open to question. I am by no means satisfied that it could not, seeing that the wrongful payment of the dividend was caused by his improper certificate and accounts, and by the use made of them by the directors. But, be this as it may, there was a clear breach of trust by the directors, facilitated, and indeed only rendered possible, by the auditor who failed in discharging his own duty to the shareholders; and I have no doubt that in equity both he and they could be properly declared jointly and severally liable for the misapplication of the company's money which constituted that breach of trust: see Leeds Estate Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd (1). With respect, therefore, to the sum of £8,486 11s., wrongfully paid as dividend in 1892, in respect of the alleged profits made in 1891, the appeal, in my opinion, fails.

I agree with VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in holding that the dividend for 1890 was in fact improperly declared and paid. But the evidence that Mr. Theobald was guilty of any breach of duty in certifying the accounts in February, 1891, is far less cogent than that which presses so heavily against him with reference to the accounts of February, 1892. The truth is that the conviction that the bank's affairs were every year getting worse and worse grew upon him year by year. This state of things was shown by the decrease of its investments and reserve capital and the increase of its loans to customers. But the loans to customers and other securities were, speaking roughly, £100,000 less at the end of the year 1890 than at the end of 1891, and, seeing that the accounts prepared by the auditors did accurately represent the position of the company as shown by the books, and that it is not proved that Mr. Theobald really knew, or ought then to have known, that the position of the bank was not correctly shown by the books, I think VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., has gone too far in holding Mr. Theobald liable for this sum. The reasons which induced the learned judge to decide that Mr. Theobald was not liable for the dividends paid in 1889 and 1890 appear to me to apply also to the dividend paid in 1891 in respect of the profits of 1890. No doubt the change made by the auditors in 1886 in the form of the certificate they had previously given is very significant, and, unexplained leads to the inference that the auditors did not believe that the books of the company and the balance-sheet prepared from them correctly showed the position of the bank.

But Mr. Theobald's evidence does, in my opinion, show that in February, 1891, matters were not known or believed to be so bad as to lead him to the conclusion that there were then no profits out of which a dividend could properly be paid. It is true that the position of the bank was very unsatisfactory in 1890, and the auditors knew it to be so. This, however, appeared from the balance-sheet and accounts which they laid before the shareholders. It is known now that the assets were put down at too high a figure; but it is not proved that the auditors knew it, or ought to have known it. The Balfour group of companies, though dependent on each other, were by no means in so tottering a state as they were a year later. Wilkinson's debt was still treated by the directors as bearing interest and as a good or, at all events, not as a bad, debt. Benham's debt was unsatisfactory, but the auditors can hardly be blamed for treating it as good, having regard to the solicitor's statement as to the security held for it. This part of the case is very near the line, but, having carefully considered it, I do not think that the evidence is sufficiently strong to establish a case of misfeasance on the part of Mr. Theobald in February, 1891. I am not satisfied that he was then guilty of more than an excusable error of judgment; although, now that all the facts are known, the error is seen to have been very serious in its consequences. As to the sum of £5,946 12s., therefore, the appeal must be allowed. As regards costs, Mr. Theobald's appeal has resulted in reducing the sum for which he has been held liable, but in other respects, and as regards his main contention, it has failed. Under these circumstances he ought not to receive or pay any costs of the appeal, and the only order as to costs will be that the official receiver be paid his costs out of the assets of the company.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree.

RIGBY, L.J., discussed the evidence against the auditor, which had led him to the same conclusion as LINDLEY, L.J., whose judgment, his Lordship said, he had had the advantage of reading and considering, and then continued as follows: The main issues seem to be (i) whether the auditor has been guilty of any misfeasance in relation to the company; (ii) whether the misfeasance had occasioned to the company loss for which compensation ought to be directed to be made, which will involve the question whether the dividends were in fact paid, not out of profits, but out of capital, and whether such payment was the fault of the auditor; and (iii) the amount of compensation which ought to be made.

In order to determine the first question it will be necessary to consider in some detail the position and duty of the auditors—what they ought to have done and what they have done. [After reading from the Companies Act, 1879, s. 7 (6), which provides (inter alia) that the auditors shall report to the members on the accounts examined by them; and, after referring to arts. 106, 107, and 114 of the company, recited by LINDLEY, L.J., His LORDSHIP proceeded:] The articles of association cannot absolve the auditors from any obligation imposed upon them by the statute, and it may be that, in this case, they do not impose any greater obligations as to the balance-sheet, though they make it clear that similar obligations extend to the accounts placed before the company, including the profit and loss account, as well as the balance-sheet. Under the statute the members of the company are entitled to have the safeguard of an expression of opinion by the auditors to the effect that the balance-sheet is a full and fair balance-sheet, and that it is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs. The words "as shown by the books of the company" seem to me to be introduced to relieve the auditors from responsibility as to affairs of the company kept out of the books and concealed from them, but not to confine their duty to a mere statement of the correspondence of the balance-sheet with the entries in the books. A full and fair balance-sheet must be such a balance-sheet as to convey a truthful statement as to the company's position. It must not conceal any known cause of weakness in the financial position, or suggest anything which cannot be supported as fairly correct from a business point of view. The provision as to its being properly drawn up so as to exhibit a correct view of the state of the company's affairs is taken from, though it does not go quite so far as, art. 9 of Table A and the schedule to the Act of 1862. Treated as an addition to the requisition for a full and fair balance-sheet it may not be easy to define the full extent of the obligation which it imposes, nor is it necessary to do so in this case; for it certainly requires a more detailed explanation of the affairs of the company than is contained in any of the balance-sheets of this bank.

It will be important to see what information the auditors actually acquired as to the business of this company and the way in which they reported upon the successive balance-sheets. Mr. Theobald and Mr. Timms were auditors of the bank from its incorporation in 1882, and they made the audits for successive years, down to and including the audit for 1891. The reports of the auditors to the members always took the form of a certificate or memorandum written on the balance-sheet for the year. Their reports on the accounts for 1882 and 1883 contained a statement to the effect that, in their opinion, the balance-sheet exhibited a true and correct view of the position of the bank. In their report on the accounts for 1885 a somewhat less emphatic statement to the same effect appears; but in the subsequent reports no such statement is to be found. In a report to the directors, dated Feb. 11, 1886, dealing with the accounts for 1885, Mr. Theobald, after noticing that the first-class investments, kept by bankers for quick realisation in case of need, stood at a considerably reduced sum, and that more than the whole capital of the company was invested in four accounts—namely, the Liberator Society, the Lands Allotment Co., the House and Lands Co., and the Building Estates Co.—and that these investments would not be easily realised in critical times, proceeds to say :

“You are doubtless aware that it is a rule with bankers to have at hand, in cash or easily realisable securities, an amount equal to at least one-third of the customers’ current accounts. Considering the small amount of uncalled capital, I think that in this case the proportion is scarcely sufficient.”

There can be no doubt that, even at that time, Mr. Theobald was aware that the state of affairs of the bank was unsatisfactory, in the important points of lock-up of capital and consequent deficiency in realisable securities.

The reports of the auditors to the members for the years 1886-1890, both inclusive, are simply to the effect that the cash and bills receivable were correct, that securities had been produced for the investments and loans (no information being given as to the amount of the securities), and that the balance-sheet agreed with the books of the company. The report on the accounts for 1891 states that the balance-sheet is a correct summary of the accounts recorded in the books, and contains, for the first time, the statement, “The value of the assets, as shown in the balance-sheet, is dependent on realisation.” Great stress has been laid by counsel for the auditor on the statement last quoted. They argued that it was sufficient to put members upon inquiry, and that from the course taken at the trial they were debarred from giving the evidence of experts as to its importance and signification. But I may say at once that it was the duty of the auditors to convey in direct and express terms to the members any information which they thought proper to be communicated; that the words of the statement, though perfectly clear in their meaning, are also entirely unimportant, amounting to a mere truism; and that no evidence of experts would have been of the slightest use for the purpose of giving to the words a greater importance or signification than they possess in themselves, even if such evidence were admissible.

To me it appears that all the reports from 1886 onwards were imperfect, and that the auditors, in giving reports in such a form, failed entirely to fulfil the statutory duties imposed upon them. Counsel for the auditor argued that such a failure would not amount to misfeasance but only to negligence, and that the auditor is not charged on the summons with negligence. I cannot admit the cogency of that argument. The reports were made in order to fulfil the statutory obligation, and to be read to the meetings in accordance with the statutes. Mr. Theobald says, with reference to this: “My certificate means the same as the Act,” and further, “I was not aware that it was considered necessary for me to give the certificate (for 1891) either in the words of the Act or not at all.” Mr. Theobald’s interpretation of his own certificate cannot be received, either in his favour or against him, and we should not unduly press against him apparent admissions made in the course of a very trying cross-examination; but his evidence does, I think, go so far as to show that the certificates were, in fact, given as reports under the Act; and, independently of the evidence, I think there can be no doubt that they were intended to be, and were, received and acted upon as reports under the Act. I consider the giving of the certificates, assuming them to be to the knowledge of the auditors, misleading certificates, to be a misfeasance within the meaning of s. 10 of the Act of 1890, and not a mere act of negligence; and that this was the meaning of the charge contained in the summons.

I can have no doubt, having regard to the terms of the certificates given and the explanations of Mr. Theobald himself, that there was a strong and growing feeling of dissatisfaction in his mind at the state of the bank’s affairs, as shown by its books, and I find no sufficient communication of facts causing this dissatisfaction. The balance-sheets, when examined, do not, in my opinion, fulfil the statutory requirements of being full and fair balance-sheets, and are not properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs, as shown by the books of the company. [His LORDSHIP then dealt with the evidence establishing this in relation to the years 1889, 1890, and 1891, which showed (inter alia) that the proportion of what might be called the outside business of the bank to that with the Balfour companies, and on the special accounts, might, roughly speaking, be put down as two-thirds at the end of 1889, one-third at the end of 1890, and one-fourth at the end of 1891; while the paid-up capital had increased in 1890 by about £76,944, and in 1891 by about £43,642. After dealing with other points in the case, and with Mr. Theobald's suggested ballot in the solvency of the Balfour companies, His LORDSHIP proceeded:] Assuming all the Balfour companies and Benham and Wilkinson to have been able to pay the whole of the sum owing by them except the amounts debited in 1891 for interest and commissions, not only the profits available for dividend would be swept away, but of the reserve fund itself little or nothing would remain. Such an assumption would, however, in my opinion, be extravagantly favourable to the auditors, and it only required that one of the debts owing by Wilkinson or by almost any one of the Balfour companies should be proved to be bad to exhaust everything belonging to the bank that was not capital. It turned out that each one of the Balfour companies and Wilkinson and Benham, as well as other debtors of the bank, were insolvent; and it is established that the bank had no funds out of which dividends could, in any point of view, be properly paid.

I wish to make it plain, as far as I can, that I am only relying upon matters which Mr. Theobald, as auditor, knew, or must reasonably be assumed to have known. The auditors must have known, and did know, that the balance-sheet for 1891 was not properly drawn up so as to show the state of the bank's affairs. That the dividend was, in fact, paid out of capital cannot, I think, admit of doubt. It has been argued that the payment of the dividend was not the proximate result of the auditors' report, as the recommendation of the directors and the vote at the meeting had to intervene. This appears to me, however, to misrepresent the state of things. The report of the auditors was a continuing representation, made, indeed, before, but in law and in good sense to be treated as repeated after, the recommendation of the dividend. It was perfectly well known to Mr. Theobald (at any rate, at the meeting where he was present and heard the reading of the report recommending a dividend, and the speech of Mr. Balfour) that this report of his was intended to be relied upon as justifying the recommendation, and as an invitation to the shareholders to vote the dividend. Not only was the report a causa sine qua non of the vote, but it was, in my judgment, a causa causans. How far the judgment should go against the auditor is a question which has given me considerable difficulty. A great deal of the reasoning which has led me to hold that the auditors reporting on the accounts of 1891 as they did was a misfeasance in relation to the company applies only to the case of that last report. The learned judge in the court below has held Mr. Theobald liable, not only for the 1891, but also for the 1890, dividend. I am far from saying that he is clearly wrong, but I cannot satisfy myself that he is clearly right. In the case of the 1890 dividend it is not, upon the evidence, made out to my full satisfaction that the auditors knew the balance-sheet to be substantially misleading, and I think it safer to confine the order to the dividend in respect of 1891.

Re HAWKES. ACKERMAN v. LOCKHART

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), February 24, 25, March 23, 1898]

[Reported [1898] 2 Ch. 1; 67 L.J.Ch. 284; 78 L.T. 336;
46 W.R. 445; 42 Sol. Jo. 381]

Solicitor—Lien—Production of documents subject to lien—Right of third party to production—Enforcement by summary order.

A solicitor's lien is simply a right to retain his client's documents as against the client and persons representing him. As between the solicitor and third parties the solicitor has no greater right to refuse production of documents on which he has a lien than his client would have if the documents were in his own possession. Accordingly, if a solicitor is required by his client to produce documents under a subpœna duces tecum the solicitor can refuse to do so if he has a lien on them, but the lien is no answer to a demand for their production by a third party. The doctrine is not confined to production under the exigency of a subpœna duces tecum; the same principle applies to other applications by solicitors who are acting for clients in litigation. Production may be enforced by a summary order.

Solicitor—Lien—Administration action—Order for production of documents subject to lien to prevent defeat of creditor's rights.

If in an administration action production by the solicitor for the executors is ordered of documents on which he has a lien acquired in respect of costs owed to him by the deceased in his lifetime, production being required to prevent the legal rights of creditors being defeated, it cannot matter whether the documents which are wanted came into the hands of the solicitor before or after the death of the deceased or before or after the commencement of the action, nor can it matter whether the executors are plaintiffs or defendants, nor who has the conduct of the action.

Solicitor—Lien—Solicitor acting for party to action—Implied agreement not to use lien to embarrass prosecution of action.

A solicitor who engages to act for a party to an action impliedly agrees that he will not use his lien on any document required for the purposes of the action so as to embarrass its prosecution.

Appeal by a solicitor from an order of KEKEWICH, J., ordering him to produce certain documents on which he had a lien. A

In August, 1895, one Hawkes died, he being then indebted to his solicitor, Cridland, who had in his possession some deeds and documents belonging to Hawkes, on which he (Cridland) had a solicitor's lien. In May, 1896, the executors of Hawkes employed Cridland to institute an action for the administration of the estate of the deceased, and such an action was commenced by Cridland, acting for them. The action not being prosecuted with due diligence, an order was made on May 14, 1897, giving the conduct of the action to a creditor. The executors remained parties to the action, and Cridland continued to act for them. The estate of the deceased was not sufficient to pay his creditors, and a question arose whether steps should be taken to get in a debt said to be due to the estate of the deceased. To determine this question it was necessary to see some of the documents on which Cridland had a lien, which documents were still in his possession. On Feb. 7, 1898, KEKEWICH, J., ordered Cridland to produce the documents at his office for perusal by the solicitors of the creditor having the conduct of the action. This order was made to enable them to prepare and lay before counsel a case for his opinion, as to what steps, if any, should be taken to get in the debt referred to. Cridland appealed against this order. B

Mar. 24, 1898. The following judgments were read.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts and continued: The ground of this appeal is that the documents ordered to be produced came into the solicitor's possession, not from the executors for the purposes of the action, but from the deceased in his lifetime, and that he, Cridland, had a lien on them before and at the time of his original client's death and before any retainer by his executors. A great number of authorities were referred to by counsel, but none of them was exactly in point, and it is necessary to consider the question for decision on principle. E

A solicitor's lien is simply a right to retain his client's documents as against the client and persons representing him. As between the solicitor and third parties the solicitor has no greater right to refuse production of documents on which he has a lien than his client would have if he had the documents in his own possession. This principle is as applicable at law as it is in equity. Accordingly, it has been long settled that, if a solicitor is required by his client to produce documents under a subpoena duces tecum, the solicitor can refuse to do so if he has a lien on them; but that the lien is no answer to a demand for their production by a third party: see Hope v. Liddell (1), Hunter v. Leathley (2). This doctrine is not confined to production under the exigency of a subpoena duces tecum. The same principle applies to other applications for production by solicitors who are acting for their clients in litigation: see, at law, Ley v. Barlow (3); in equity, Furlong v. Howard (4). Nothing can be clearer than LORD REDESDALE's judgment in this last case. He said: G

"Though a solicitor may have a lien on a deed for his costs, yet, if his client is bound to produce it for the benefit of a third person, so also must the solicitor. I know this is not so understood in general; but the common opinion that the solicitor may withhold it from all parties in such a case is erroneous. The right is only as between his client and him." I

It is on this principle that courts of equity order solicitors acting for clients who are parties to actions to produce documents on which the solicitors have a lien if their production is necessary for the purpose of doing justice to other persons besides their respective clients.

Administration actions are the most familiar instances of such actions. But the principle is not confined to them. As, however, we are dealing with an administration action I will refer only to such actions. It must not be forgotten that before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, a creditor could be restrained from enforcing his debt at law after a decree for the administration of his debtor's estate, and a court of equity never allowed the proceedings under the decree to be embarrassed by the liens of solicitors of the parties. The solicitors of the parties to the proceedings are not deprived of their liens and treated as if they had none; but they are not allowed to render the proceedings abortive by refusing to produce documents in their possession which are wanted by other persons than their own clients, and which such other persons have a right to see. But even as between solicitor and client, where the client is a party to an action his solicitor may be bound to produce for the purpose of the action any documents of the client which are wanted for the purposes of the action, and which have come into the solicitor's possession in the course thereof, or for the purpose of conducting the same: see Ross v. Laughton (5) and other cases collected in DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE (5th Edn.), vol. 2, p. 1717. This rule, however, does not cover the point to be decided in the present case.

To return to administration actions. If a creditor sued his debtor or his executor at law and required the defendant's solicitor by a subpoena duces tecum to produce a document belonging to the defendant, but in the possession of the solicitor who had a lien upon it, I take it to be plain that the lien did not justify the solicitor in refusing to produce the document; and Ley v. Barlow (3) shows that an order for its production might be made even before trial without subpoena. If these are the principles on which the court acts in an administration action, if the production is ordered in order to prevent the legal rights of creditors from being defeated, it cannot matter whether the documents which are wanted came into the hands of the solicitor of the parties before or after the death of the deceased, or before or after the commencement of the action for administration; nor can it matter whether the executors are plaintiffs or are defendants, nor who has the conduct of the action. Having regard to the rights of the creditors, if Hawkes' executors now had the conduct of the action, their solicitor could not, in my opinion, effectually rely on his lien on the documents of the deceased to prevent their production for the purposes of enabling the executors to get in the assets of the deceased. The rights of the creditors under the administration judgment, and their inability to sue at law, explain the apparent anomaly that the executors should be entitled to obtain production from their own solicitor of documents on which he has a lien as against them. The fact that they have been deprived of the conduct of the action does not improve the solicitor's position so long, at all events, as his clients remain parties to the action, and have not discharged him: see on this point Bennett v. Barter (6), Simmonds v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (7). Further, Cridland's clients are still parties, and he acts for them. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what his right might be under other circumstances.

The general rule of the court, founded on the principles above referred to, is very emphatically stated in Belancy v. French (8). That was an administration suit, and it was the case of a solicitor who had acted for several of the parties to it, and had been discharged by them, and who refused to produce documents belonging to them, but on which he had a lien. The receiver who had been appointed in the action wanted to see the documents, and JAMES, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. at p. 920):

"A solicitor cannot embarrass a suit by keeping papers which belong to an estate which is being administered by the court, and cannot use that means of obtaining payment."

Re Boughton (9) is another recent decision to the same effect, and, further, FRY, J., there points out the importance of the rights of creditors. It is, however, true that the documents which were in question in those cases came into the solicitor's hands from the clients who discharged them. The point, therefore, made before us by Mr. Cridland's counsel had not to be considered. A

I proceed now to examine the authorities more particularly relied upon by Cridland in support of his contention. The first and most important is Warburton v. Edge (10). The facts of that case are not very clearly stated; but, as I understand them, an administratrix who was abroad had a solicitor here who had acted for her in a suit for the administration of the deceased's estate, but had been instructed by her to act for her no longer, and a receiver had been appointed. The solicitor had some documents which came into his hands after the death of the deceased, on which he claimed a lien, not only for the costs of the suit, but for other costs due to him from the administratrix before the commencement of the suit. The plaintiffs were creditors of the deceased, and they petitioned for an order of a very unusual nature. They prayed for an order on the solicitor to deliver to the receiver or to deposit with the master all deeds, etc., in his custody relating to the personal estate of the deceased, subject to any lien the solicitor might have, and for an inquiry into the existence of any lien which the solicitor might claim, and as to the amount due to him in respect of it, and, if necessary, for a taxation of his bill of costs to the intent that it might be paid out of the estate of the deceased. SHADWELL, V.-C., refused to make any order on this petition. He said the plaintiffs had no right to the production of the documents, as some of them had come into the solicitor's hands before the suit commenced, and he had a lien on them for costs in other business besides the conduct of the suit. The Vice-Chancellor also said the plaintiffs had no right to tax the solicitor's bill. The petition being really a petition by a creditor for the taxation of the solicitor's costs and for payment of them by the administratrix, the order of the Vice-Chancellor seems to have been right. But, if he meant to say that the creditor had no right to have the documents produced for the purpose of the action because of the lien, the Vice-Chancellor, in my opinion, went too far. Having regard to what he said in Baker v. Henderson (11), he may have meant to go this length. That case presents no difficulty, although the first few words of the judgment were relied upon by counsel for Mr. Cridland. B C D E F

In Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12) an order was made to wind-up a company. The company had employed a solicitor who, when the petition for a winding-up order was presented, had a lien on some document which the liquidator wanted. CHITTY, J., made an order directing the solicitor to deliver those documents to the liquidator, but subject to the solicitor's lien. On appeal this order was discharged as to some of the documents, viz., those referred to in the third part of the order on which the solicitor had a lien before the petition was presented. The ground of this decision, as I understand it, was that the solicitor was not the solicitor of the liquidator in the winding-up proceedings and was not acting for the company in those proceedings: see per COTTON, L.J., 24 Ch.D. at p. 417, the liquidator having employed another solicitor. The court moreover pointed out that as to these documents the liquidator could obtain production of them under the winding-up sections of the Companies Act, 1862, as decided in Re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., Ex parte Paine and Layton (13). No doubt COTTON, L.J., said (see 24 Ch.D. at p. 420) that Re Boughton (9) did not apply to "such a case." By this expression I understand was meant the case of documents in the hands of a solicitor before the administration suit commenced, which solicitor was not employed in that suit by the client against whom the lien could be asserted. In such a case the solicitor would be a stranger to the litigation, and could not be compelled to produce documents except as a witness by subpœna duces tecum. That was the sort of case which COTTON, L.J., had to consider, and I do not understand the observations to apply to the case of a solicitor employed in an administration suit by a party to the suit who could be made by the other parties or by creditors to produce documents otherwise than by subpœna. G H I documents on which he had a lien before the action was commenced, although he could not withhold those which came into his possession afterwards. NORTH, J., who decided this case, acted on the authority of Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12). If third parties were entitled to have the documents produced, Boden v. Hensby (14) went too far in favour of the solicitor. These were the principal authorities referred to, and the only ones which it is necessary to notice. None of them appears to me to compel the court to reverse the order appealed from. It seems to me right in principle and the appeal ought, therefore, to be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—The respondent was a creditor of the deceased person whose estate is being administered, and the conduct of the cause has been transferred to him. Mr. Cridland has acted for the plaintiffs from the commencement of the action, and does so now, so that there can be no question as to his having been discharged, if that be material. The order made is for production only, that being apparently sufficient for the purpose of ascertaining what information useful for the statements in the case to be laid before counsel the documents contain. But for the fact that the lien arose before the action was commenced, there could, I think, be no question on the decided cases that the order appealed from is correct.

The question will turn out to be one, in my judgment, of procedure only. There can be no doubt of the right of the creditor to production, and the only question which can arise is whether that right should be enforced against the solicitor as a witness or whether a summary order in the action is, according to the course of practice, permissible. As to documents which the solicitor has obtained in, or for the purposes of, the action, it is clear that a summary order in the action may be made. The only possible doubt is as to those on which he had a lien before the action. Whether the lien was acquired from the testator or his executors, seems to me to be immaterial. At law the very case seems to me to have been decided in Ley v. Barlow (3), where inspection before trial was ordered of documents which were in the possession of the attorney of a party to the action, notwithstanding that he had a lien upon them before action. This case has not to my knowledge ever been questioned. It was, however, apparently decided on the authority of Hunter v. Leathley (2), which had reference to a witness required by a subpoena duces tecum to produce the document under consideration, and more especially of Steadman v. Arden (15), where it is not clear that the lien was insisted upon. It may be possible, therefore, to suggest that the distinction was not so clearly brought before the court as to make the case a conclusive authority. Although, therefore, I am of opinion, as will hereafter appear, that the case was well decided, and that the doctrine is the same in equity as at law, yet, having regard to the numerous cases cited before us in the arguments, and to a certain amount of confusion and apparent conflict between them, I think it better to discuss the present case on principle supported by some authorities which cannot be questioned.

The clear statement of the limit to the right of a solicitor to refuse production of documents on which he has a lien enunciated by LORD REDESDALE in Furlong v. Howard (4) may be and has been rested on the very general rule that no one can give greater rights to another than he has himself. The owner of a document who would himself be obliged to produce it for the purposes of justice cannot give to his solicitor a right to refuse production. LORD REDESDALE'S statement of the law in Furlong v. Howard (4) is only one of many statements to the like effect to be found in the books, though it is a very clear and important instance. The principle itself is so obviously just that I do not think it requires any further support on authority, and I only go into the authorities for the purpose of showing that it has been recognised down to the present time, in order to get rid of any argument that might be set up that the law has been changed.

In addition to the cases already mentioned of Hunter v. Leathley (2) (where the lien was a broker's lien on a policy of insurance, but the principle is the same) and Ley v. Barlow (3), I may refer to the following cases. In Commerell v. Poynton

(16) LORD ELDON said (1 Swan. at p. 2): "A solicitor cannot, by virtue of his lien, prevent the king's subject from obtaining justice." The same principle is to be found enunciated throughout the whole of the carefully considered judgment of LORD SUGDEN in Blunden v. Desart (17). In Brassington v. Brassington (18), which case was treated as undoubted law in Hope v. Liddell (1), SIR JOHN LEACH says (1 Sim. & St. at p. 457):

"It would be very extraordinary if a deed by which property is conveyed were to be of no effect because the party who executed the deed did not choose to pay his solicitor's bill. It may be very reasonable that the husband [the document was a marriage settlement] if calling for the deed for his own purposes, should not have access to it until the solicitor's claim was satisfied; but to refuse to produce it as a witness for the other party cannot be justified."

In Hope v. Liddell (1), above referred to, KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., says (7 De G.M. & G. at p. 336):

"If Benjamin Norton and Edward Spencer Norton [the persons against whom the lien was claimed] were now alive, and either of them had actual possession of the deed, he would be compellable certainly to produce it for the purpose of evidence at the instance of the defendants. Why then . . . should not Mr. Clipperton [the solicitor claiming a lien] do so? I think that he ought."

TURNER, L.J., said that he had long thought the question settled by Brassington v. Brassington (18). In Re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., Ex parte Payne and Layton (13), LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., made, under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, an order for production against a solicitor claiming a lien on documents belonging to a company in liquidation. The Lord Chancellor, after referring to the case of a client asking for production without having paid his solicitor's bill, said it was equally beyond doubt that a solicitor would have been ordered to produce on a subpoena duces tecum obtained by a creditor or third party. He then decides the case on the ground that under the Companies Act the official liquidator represented the creditors as well as the company. This is an express decision of the Lord Chancellor that a creditor is not a person who claims through or under the client so as to be in the same position with him, but is a person claiming hostilely to him so as to be entitled to the full benefit of LORD REDESDALE's statement of the law in Furlong v. Howard (4).

In Belancy v. Ffrench (8) JAMES, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. at p. 920):

"But a solicitor cannot embarrass a suit by keeping papers which belong to an estate which is being administered by the court, and cannot use that means of obtaining payment."

It may be, as suggested by COTTON, L.J., in Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12) that in Belancy v. Ffrench (8) only papers in the cause were being dealt with; but I do not think that the generality of the language used by JAMES, L.J., ought to be limited, though the case itself would, if COTTON, L.J., is right as to the facts, be no authority as to the way in which production of deeds on which a lien attached prior to suit is to be procured against a debtor who has been discharged. COTTON, L.J., in Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12), said that a solicitor can claim no greater lien than the person who puts the documents into his hands is capable of creating. Many of the cases dealt with by me involve the same principle, and there are other decisions which might if necessary be cited to the same effect: see, for instance, FRY, J., in Re Boughton (9). These authorities make it clear that the principle enunciated by LORD REDESDALE in Furlong v. Howard (4) has never been modified, and any dicta or even any decision if there be any which is contrary to that principle, must be wrong.

I now go to the consideration of the remedies against a solicitor to enforce production or delivery notwithstanding his lien. (i) Of course delivery of the document may be enforced by way of redemption as in Christian v. Field (19), where the plaintiff in a creditors' suit (Christian v. Chambers), who had in that suit obtained a decree for sale of real estate of a testator for the payment of his debts was held entitled to maintain a suit (Christian v. Field) to redeem title deeds held by a solicitor of the testator claiming a lien on them, but an entire stranger to the creditors' suit. In that case redemption was the only effectual remedy, since the deeds were wanted for the purpose of delivering them to the purchaser. (ii) Where there is no litigation in which the solicitor acts or has acted for one of the parties the usual course is to summon him as a witness on a subpoena duces tecum, and to require him to produce the document on which he claims a lien. Several of the cases above referred to, including Brassington v. Brassington (18) and Hope v. Liddell (1), are of this nature, and there are many other cases both at law and in equity which might be cited. There is no case, so far as I know, where production has not been enforced against a solicitor notwithstanding the lien if the person demanding production could have enforced production against the client. Consistently with LORD REDESDALE's statement in Furlong v. Howard (4), there could be no such case. (iii) There are innumerable instances in which a solicitor has been ordered summarily to produce or deliver without prejudice to his lien where he is or has been a party, plaintiff or defendant. Perhaps the most common case is that now before us, viz., an administration action, though the practice is not confined to administration actions. Wherever the court has taken upon itself the administration of or dealing with an estate for the benefit of persons other than those against whom the lien authorises a refusal to produce, it has been the practice to enforce production in a summary way, by order in the action against the solicitor of any party, and Ley v. Barlow (3) has been already indicated as a case of this kind at law. No case has been produced which shows that any difference is to be made so long as the solicitor continues to act as solicitor in the action, with reference to a lien existing before suit and one arising during the pending action. Nor can there be any such difference in principle. A solicitor who engages to act for a party to an action impliedly agrees that he will not use his lien on any document required for the purposes of the action so as to embarrass the prosecution of it.

This conclusion would be sufficient for the purpose of this appeal, but many cases of the exercise of the summary jurisdiction have been cited, and it may be desirable to see whether any of them are adverse to the proposition laid down. The first cases of the kind that I need mention are Ross v. Laughton (5) and Commerell v. Poynton (16), both decisions of LORD ELDON. In the first, on the application of assignees of a bankrupt defendant to an administration action in which a decree had been made, LORD ELDON made an order for production against the defendant's solicitor notwithstanding his lien. In the second, LORD ELDON, on the application of the defendant against his solicitor who had refused to proceed in the action, ordered the solicitor to permit inspection by the defendant for the purposes of the action, and directed production by the solicitor before the master for the purposes of the action. I mention these cases particularly, because LORD ELDON has been supposed to have withdrawn somewhat from the doctrine involved in them, by what fell from him in Lord v. Wormleighton (20). LORD ELDON's decision in the last mentioned case has been referred to as more favourable to the solicitor's lien than the earlier cases. The case itself has frequently been misunderstood. It has been argued that LORD ELDON there laid down something inconsistent with the former decisions in Commerell v. Poynton (16), Ross v. Laughton (5), and his subsequent decision in Colegrave v. Manley (21). LORD COTTENHAM, however, in Heslop v. Metcalfe (22), treats the case as quite consistent with Colegrave v. Manley (21), and with Commerell v. Poynton (16). In like manner WOOD and SELWYN, L.JJ., in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (7), expressly decided that Ross v. Laughton (5) was not overruled by it. In Belaney v. Ffrench (8) BACON, V.-C., referring to Lord v. Wormleighton (20), said that LORD ELDON's words were greatly misunderstood if they were understood to say that a solicitor might, by detaining papers, embarrass the proper and rational progress of an administration suit. The opinion of JAMES, L.J., in the same case has already been cited, and both were expressly approved by FRY, J., in Re Boughton (9). Having regard to all these explanations of Lord v. Wormleighton (20), it is impossible, I think, to treat it as introducing any substantial change into the law as to solicitors' lien. It is, in my judgment, only a decision against the exercise of summary jurisdiction in the case where a solicitor has not discharged himself but has been in effect discharged, and his former clients move against him. A

Colegrave v. Manley (21) is a very leading and important case on the subject of the summary jurisdiction. There LORD ELDON, in the case of a solicitor who had discharged himself, made an order that he, the late solicitor, should deliver to the new solicitor of his former client all the proceedings in the cause, and all such deeds, evidence, papers, and writings whatsoever as had come into the possession or custody of the late solicitor belonging to the plaintiff and which related to the cause, subject to the lien of the late solicitor for the amount of what should be found due to him on the taxation of his bill of costs. The terms of this order are sufficiently wide to include papers and costs which respectively came into the solicitor's hands and were incurred before the commencement of the suit, though it does not clearly appear that there were any such. In Baker v. Henderson (11) SHADWELL, V.-C., when making an order on the plaintiff's solicitor for the production of documents in his possession for the purposes of the suit, takes notice that the solicitor had no lien on the documents anterior to the suit. This, however, only means that he had not to decide a question as to such an antecedent lien. C

In Heslop v. Metcalfe (22) the same learned judge, on the authority of Colegrave v. Manley (21), ordered delivery up by a solicitor, held to have discharged himself, of papers in a suit to his client's new solicitor. This decision was affirmed on appeal by LORD COTTENHAM. LORD COTTENHAM there also relies on Colegrave v. Manley (21), and especially on a paragraph in LORD ELDON's judgment in these terms (Turn. & R. at p. 402): E

"So far as the use of papers is concerned, the suitor, when his solicitor discharges himself, must have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity and as little expense as if the connection of solicitor and client had not been dissolved."

It does appear from the report of Heslop v. Metcalfe (22) (3 My. & Cr. 183) that the papers were only papers in the cause, though the late solicitor claimed a lien thereon for his general costs outside the suit; but this fact was only relied upon as evidence of the solicitor having discharged himself, and there is not a word in the carefully considered judgment of LORD COTTENHAM to show that he would have excluded from the order papers received before the commencement of the suit, and subject to a lien for general costs, if in fact they were necessary for the proper prosecution of the suit. The nature of the suit is not shown from the report. G

Warburton v. Edge (10) is a case which has been much discussed, and is not easy to understand. I think that the true view of the case is that the petition presented by the plaintiffs, creditors of the deceased person whose estate was being administered, was an informal application for redemption of the documents referred to in it on terms which the plaintiffs had no right to impose, and that it was dismissed partly on that ground and partly on the ground that the plaintiffs had no locus standi. One main reason for the order made on the judgment is that the solicitor had a lien on the documents prior to the right of the administrator to take them out of his hands; the lien was consequently prior to the right of the plaintiffs who were merely general creditors of the deceased's estate, and could only take the estate as they found it. This seems to me to be in direct opposition to the string of authorities above cited commencing with Furlong v. Howard (4), and deprives the case of any weight as an authority. I

A The next case which I think it worth while to deal with is that of Bennett v. Baxter (6). It decided that the fact of the conduct of an administration suit being taken from the plaintiffs and given to another creditor did not entitle the plaintiffs' solicitor to treat himself as discharged, or in a better position than if he had discharged himself, and gave the creditor having the conduct the right to inspect and take copies of all papers in the cause. On the authority of Colegrave v. Manley (21) B an order for delivery, if asked for, might, I think, have been made. The constant recurrence of a distinction between the position of a solicitor discharging himself and that of one who has been discharged will be observed, and I think that there has been a good deal of misapprehension as to the meaning of those cases. In fact, they only apply to the exercise of summary jurisdiction to make an order in the suit. If a solicitor, having a lien, does not act and never has acted in the suit C for a client party thereto, the course of procedure against him cannot in general be by way of application in the suit to which he is in every way a stranger. If he begins to act for a party, he must of course be taken to be ready to do everything necessary for carrying on the suit effectually. He certainly cannot set up a lien acquired during the progress of the suit so as to embarrass the proceedings in it; and no case that I have heard of has laid it down that he can, while acting in the D suit, use in such a manner a previously acquired lien. If his client discharges him it is obvious that such discharge cannot in substance affect the right to production of any third party. The utmost effect of any of the class of cases now being dealt with has been to place him in the circumstances of the particular case in the same position as if he had never been a party to the litigation; that is to say, to release him from the summary jurisdiction. Even as to this, I have not observed a case E in which the summary jurisdiction has been cut down except where the client himself or his representative has been the applicant, though I should hesitate to say that there are no cases to that effect. If, on the other hand, the solicitor discharges himself, he has always been held to be in the same position as though he continued to act; that is to say, to be subject to the summary jurisdiction.

F Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12) has been supposed to indicate that the summary jurisdiction cannot extend to the case of a lien acquired before the commencement of the litigation. I do not think that to be the meaning of the case. COTTON, L.J., there guarded himself carefully against appearing to lay down any such conclusion. He said, referring to the documents which the solicitors had possession of before Sept. 18, 1882, i.e., the commencement of the litigation (24 G Ch.D. at p. 417),

"they came to the hands of the solicitor before the presentation of the petition, and I see nothing to affect his lien."

H He cannot by these words have meant that the right of any person to insist upon the production on subpoena was taken away. When the three authorities relied upon by CHITTY, J., in the court below were referred to, he says:

"None of them seem to me to govern the case. A solicitor employed in a suit is in a very different position."

I This can, I think, only mean, having regard to what he had before said, that in a suit a solicitor may be subject to the summary jurisdiction as to documents on which he acquired a lien before suit. It is remarkable that in no case in which a solicitor has been held to be subject to the summary jurisdiction has there been any attempt to limit the summary jurisdiction by saying that it could not apply to a lien acquired before suit. It seems to me that it is more in accordance with common sense that the summary jurisdiction should, if it applies at all, be extended to all cases, than that an order under it should be confined to papers acquired in or for the purposes of the action, while as to those acquired before the action the procedure to compel production by the solicitor as a witness should necessarily be resorted to. My conclusion is that Ley v. Barlow (3) should be maintained, and the appeal dismissed A with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. I agree in the result, but, having been favoured with the opportunity of reading the judgments of SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., and RIGBY, L.J., I prefer to give my own reasons, which differ considerably from those of the Master of the Rolls and RIGBY, L.J. B

I agree that it would seem to be an unsatisfactory state of the law if, in a case where the conduct of an administration suit is taken from the plaintiff-executor and given to a creditor, the solicitor for the plaintiff-executor should be able to embarrass the progress of the suit by refusing to produce documents on which he has a lien, even though he acquired such lien on the documents received from the testator in respect of work done for him; but, if production by the solicitor of such documents C is to be ordered, it is important to ascertain the principle on which the order is made. A precisely similar order was made in Bennett v. Baxter (6); but SHADWELL, V.-C., in that case, based his order on the misconduct of the solicitor in delaying the suit, which misconduct led to the conduct of the suit being given to a creditor. No misconduct is, however, imputed to the solicitor in the present case, and it, therefore, becomes necessary to consider on what principle an order on this solicitor D for production can be made.

There can be no doubt but that the lien of the solicitor would not be a ground for refusal to produce the documents at the trial of an action if the solicitor were served with a subpoena issued at the instance of any person other than the person against whom the lien came into existence or someone claiming through him. E Hope v. Liddell (1) is a clear authority for this; so also is Furlong v. Howard (4) and Brassington v. Brassington (18). This, however, would not justify the order to produce in this case, unless either it is right to make an order to produce before trial in every case in which production would be compelled at the trial by a person served with a subpoena duces tecum, or unless an executor in an administration action, or a creditor having the conduct of it, is to be treated as a person other than F the testator or someone claiming under him. It is said that there is no difference between the liability to produce at the trial and a liability to produce before the trial, and that whenever the one production can be compelled the other can also. I do not think that is so. If it were so, one would have expected to find instances of orders on mere strangers to an action to produce documents which they had in their possession for inspection by a party to the action before trial. I know of no G such order.

The report on Furlong v. Howard (4) is very short, and it is not at all clear from it that the order to produce was not at the trial, or that the document was not an instrument in which the applicant who obtained the order had not an interest as a party thereto. In Ley v. Barlow (3), and in Steadman v. Arden (15), and in Hunter v. Leathley (2) the applicant who obtained the order for production before trial had an interest as a contracting party in the document ordered to be produced for H inspection, and at law it was always the practice, even before there was any statutory provision for discovery, to order the production of such documents for the purpose of pleading, but save for this purpose, and in the case of such documents no order could be obtained to compel a third party, a stranger to the action, to produce documents for inspection in a cause: see Cocks v. Nash (23), where the whole subject I is very fully discussed. Moreover, it is difficult to explain the refusal of the order for production and inspection in Lord v. Wormleighton (20), or the necessity to rely in Bennett v. Baxter (6) on the default of the attorney, if there was any broad general rule which could be invoked to the effect that every witness must produce for inspection before trial any document which he would be compelled to produce at the trial on a subpoena duces tecum.

It seems to me important in examining the authorities to notice the distinction between orders for delivery up of papers and an order for production of papers; and again the distinction between an order for the production of papers by a solicitor who by words or conduct has discharged himself and an order for production by a solicitor who has been discharged without misconduct on his part by the client. The granting or refusal of an order for delivery up of papers by the acting solicitor to the client does not involve the affirmation or negation of any obligation by a stranger to the action to produce a document which he holds subject to his lien; nor does the order for production by a solicitor, who has discharged himself, of documents received by him for the purposes of the cause; but an order on a solicitor discharged by the client to produce before the trial for inspection documents on which he has a lien might involve the affirmation of such an obligation by a mere witness to produce before trial documents on which he had a lien, for the solicitor in such case would without any fault of his own have become a stranger to the action. But I do not think it does. Re Faithfull (24) seems to me to lay down the rule that a discharged solicitor is under no obligation to deliver or even produce or allow inspection of papers on which he has a lien. And I am not aware that a solicitor thus discharged has any special rights or liabilities beyond those of other persons holding documents subject to a lien. But, on the other hand, it is clear law that in administration and other representative actions a discharged solicitor cannot resist production at the instance of creditors of documents received for the purpose of the action.

What is the reason of this apparent anomaly? The reason seems to me to be that a solicitor receiving from his client papers in the course of a cause for the purpose of doing justice to his client thereby undertakes to produce them if necessary in the cause, and is not relieved from this undertaking by being discharged by the client in so far as relates to the obligation incurred by the client in that cause. Even if this does not explain the anomaly, the fact remains that administration and representative actions are at all events treated as a special class outside the general rule. The very fact that in cases of orders for production as distinguished from delivery, a distinction is drawn between papers received for the purposes of the cause and papers not so received: see Ross v. Laughton (5); Commerell v. Poynton (16); Valc v. Oppert (25); seems to point to the liability to produce for inspection being based, not on any general obligation, but on special obligations attaching to solicitors.

The result of all these considerations seems to be to show that there is no liability in a mere stranger to produce documents on which he has a lien before the trial or otherwise than at the trial in obedience to subpoena. This being my view, I will not trouble to consider how far the plaintiff in an administration action, as representing the creditors of the estate, can set up the right of third persons to insist on the production under a subpoena, and I will now proceed to consider whether there is any special obligation on a solicitor as such to produce for inspection before trial documents in circumstances like those appearing in the present case. The remedy against a solicitor who wrongfully refuses to produce or deliver up papers is by summary order against him as an officer of the court. The obligation of a solicitor claiming a lien on papers received by him professionally, and the extent of the remedy against him are defined in a long series of cases chiefly in courts of equity.

These cases mostly turn on the difference in the obligation of a solicitor who has been discharged by the client and a solicitor who has discharged himself by refusing to continue to act. The present case differs from such cases in that the solicitor has not been discharged by the client or by his own refusal to act, but continues the solicitor in the cause. So far as relates to the cases of solicitors discharged by the client there is a long series of cases going to show that a solicitor discharged by the client is liable to produce for inspection or deliver up, subject to his lien, all papers received for the purpose of the cause in every case in which litigants other than his client are concerned at the instance of such other parties, and creditors and others concerned in administration and other representative actions are treated for this purpose as parties to the litigation distinct from the client of the solicitor, but these cases all limit the obligation to papers received by the solicitor for the purpose of the cause and seem to exclude from the obligation papers on which the solicitor has a lien acquired prior to and irrespective of the cause. Ross v. Laughton (5), Belaney v. Ffrench (8), Re Boughton (9), Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12), Boden v. Hensby (14) are examples of this class of case. It is difficult to reconcile Lord v. Wormleighton (20) and Warburton v. Edge (10) with the obligation to produce or deliver up in these cases. The distinction between Ross v. Laughton (5) and Lord v. Wormleighton (20) upon the ground on which the lords justices tried to reconcile them in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (7) seems too narrow, as it would exclude administration actions from the scope of those cases. The obligation of the discharged solicitor to produce in the cause papers received for the purpose of the cause in administration or representative actions seems, however, well established.

What is the obligation of a solicitor who has not been discharged in reference to the production of papers? I cannot doubt but that he is bound to produce all papers received in the action; but does his obligation go further? Is he bound to produce papers received before the action on which he had already acquired a lien? I think he is. There is no direct authority; but the observation of SHADWELL, V.-C., in Bennett v. Baxter (6) and of the lords justices, in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (7), seem to show that he is, and that this is an obligation, not towards persons other than his client, but to the client himself. The solicitor has a mere right of retainer, and the enforcement of that right seems to me inconsistent with the duty which he has undertaken to perform. He must, I think, be taken to have known, when he accepted the retainer, that it might be necessary to produce under an order for discovery made on his client in the action those papers upon which he had a lien, and to have waived by simple implication his lien so far as the production of the papers might prove necessary in the suit. This obligation is one which continues in its entirety if he voluntarily discharges himself. He must still continue to afford facilities for the prosecution of the suit. It is to be remarked also that there is no case reported in which a solicitor, while still the solicitor on the record, has ever successfully resisted, or indeed attempted to resist, this obligation on account of a lien acquired prior to the action, which is very remarkable, as the opportunity for making such a claim must have arisen again and again. I wish to add that, even if I am wrong in assuming that this is an obligation of the solicitor towards the client, the obligation might yet be held to arise in the case of an administration action or any action in which the rights of other persons are concerned, but I prefer to rest my judgment on the ground of obligation to the client.

I may add that I think that Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (12) and Boden v. Hensby (14), in so far as these cases are authorities for limiting, in the case of a solicitor discharged by the client, the order, whether for production or delivery up of papers, to papers received in the action, are in accordance with previous authority; and I wish further to add that I think that, if Colegrave v. Manley (21) and Heslop v. Metcalfe (22) are looked at, there is nothing in them to show that the orders were intended to extend to papers received by the solicitors before the action; but, on the contrary, the observations of LORD COTTENHAM and the Vice-Chancellor point in the opposite direction. The order in Bennett v. Baxter (6) is similarly limited to documents in the cause.

MARSH v. JOSEPH

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), November 19, 23, 24, December 18, 1896]

Solicitor—Misconduct—Negligence—Breach of duty—Liability to pay compensation—Measure of liability—Ratification of acts of another—Need to prove full knowledge or unqualified adoption.

Where negligence or other breach of duty is committed by a solicitor, an officer of the court, in a matter in which the court has seisin, the court may, and, if it can do full justice, will, summarily order its officer to make good the loss occasioned by his neglect or breach of duty. But the limit of liability is the measure of the loss flowing from the negligence or breach of duty. The court cannot, merely because the officer has been guilty of misconduct, mulct him in damages. The damages must flow from the act of negligence or misconduct.

Where the negligence or misconduct is said to have arisen from the ratification by the solicitor of improper or illegal acts previously done by another person, to constitute a binding ratification of acts a priori unauthorised the acts must have been done for and in the name of the solicitor, and there must be proved full knowledge of what those acts were, or such an unqualified adoption that the inference may properly be drawn that the solicitor intended to take on himself the responsibility for such acts, however culpable they were.

Circumstances in which a solicitor held not to have ratified or adopted the fraudulent acts of another.

Solicitor—Partnership—Liability for act of partner—Permission to third person to use name of firm.

It is not within the scope of the agency authority created by the partnership for one partner in a firm of solicitors to allow the use of the name of the firm by another solicitor, and thereby to bind his co-partner with responsibility for any liability which may be thereby incurred.

Appeals and Cross-Appeals by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown, John G Clear, and J. E. Green, respectively, from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., in a matter arising out of the fraud of John Arthur Hales, a solicitor, suffering imprisonment for forgery in relation to funds paid into court to the credit of the above action.

Dec. 18, 1896. LORD RUSSELL, C.J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case the question is whether John Clear and J. E. Green, of 1, Old Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, who were in partnership as solicitors under the firm name of "Clear and Green," are liable to make good, or whether either of them is liable to make good, all, or any, and what part of a sum of £6,387 0s. 2d., which stood to the credit of the suit of Marsh v. Joseph, and which was paid out by the Paymaster-General pursuant to an order of KEKEWICH, J., dated July 13, 1895, that order having been procured by the fraud of one J. A. Hales, a solicitor. Hales was an undischarged bankrupt, and an uncertificated solicitor. That he was the former was known to Clear; the latter fact was not. Hales was also a commissioner for I

A taking affidavits, and had been brought in this character into connection with Clear and Green.

The facts are these. In 1877 the action of Marsh v. Joseph was instituted for the administration of the trusts of a settlement of Sept. 9, 1858. In that suit J. A. Hales acted as solicitor for the plaintiffs therein. Under the settlement Jacob Moses (who subsequently changed his name to John Moses Marsh) was entitled to certain
B property for life, and he had power to appoint the same to one or more of his children, and failing appointment it devolved upon all equally. Later the settled property was sold, and the fund in court represented the proceeds. In July, 1895, Hales called upon Clear and said he had some business, and that he should require another solicitor to represent one of the formal parties, and asked Clear: "Will you act for me?" To this Clear replied: "We shall be very happy on receiving
C instructions." The name of the case was not mentioned, nor the character of the business, nor the name of the supposed formal party for whom Clear and Green were to act, and those gentlemen heard nothing further about the matter until after the consummation of Hales' fraud, and after payment out by the Paymaster-General of the fund in question.

On July 13, 1895, a petition was presented in the name of Joseph Moses Marsh, which, after reciting the settlement of 1858, that Joseph Moses Marsh had been
D certified by the chief clerk in the suit of Marsh v. Joseph to be the eldest son of John Moses Marsh (former Jacob Moses), and that certain appointments of new trustees under the settlement of 1858 had been made, proceeded to state that, by deed poll of Dec. 31, 1894, John Moses Marsh, under his power of appointment, and subject to his own life interest, had irrevocably appointed the sum then in court
E standing to the credit of the action of Marsh v. Joseph to his son, Joseph Moses Marsh, absolutely for his own benefit. Such petition further stated that John Moses Marsh died on Mar. 8, 1895. The petition then prayed that the court should, subject to certain provisions as to costs and for payment of succession duty (properly estate duty), order that the fund be paid to the petitioner, Joseph Moses Marsh. Upon the back of that petition the names "John Clear & Co." appear as solicitors
F for the petitioner. The petition was verified by what purported to be an affidavit of the petitioner, to which were exhibited (among other documents) the settlement of 1858 and the alleged deed-poll of Dec. 31, 1894. The affidavit is endorsed "John Clear & Co., Serjeants' Inn."

For the purposes of the hearing of the petition, Hales, again using the name of "John Clear & Co.," instructed Mr. Brodie Cooper as counsel, to appear in support
G of the petition, and in the name of "J. Hales" instructed Mr. Cockburn, as counsel, to appear for all the other parties interested, and to consent to the prayer of the petition. Accordingly, the matter came before KEKEWICH, J., on July 13, 1895, when he made the order prayed. The "payment schedule" to the order provided
I for payment to "John Clear, of Serjeants' Inn," as petitioner's solicitor, of "agreed costs" of petitioner, £15 to "John Hales, of 15, Clifford's Inn," of £10 as "agreed costs" of the respondents, and in respect of the estate duty £224 11s. 5d. Accordingly, on Aug. 10, 1895, three cheques were drawn in the Paymaster-General's office upon the Bank of England—one, payable to Joseph Moses Marsh, for £6,137 8s. 9d.; one, payable to John Clear, for £15; and one, payable to John Hales, for £10. These cheques, with provision for estate duty (£224 11s. 5d.), exhausted the fund
J in court (£6,387 0s. 2d.). On the same day, by, or upon the introduction of, John A. Hales, an account was opened at Child's Bank in the name of Joseph Moses Marsh, and the cheque of £6,137 8s. 9d. was paid in to the credit of that account, and was credited as cash. On the same day, also, two cheques were drawn upon the account, one for £100 to "self," and the other for £1 8s. 1d. to "J. A. Hales," and were cashed.

Shortly put, the means by which the money was obtained out of court were the fraudulent contrivances of Hales, either acting alone or in complicity with some other person or persons. There was no deed of appointment by John Moses Marsh

—the document produced was a forgery; and no affidavit in verification of the petition had been made by Joseph Moses Marsh. The proceedings were in fraud of that person and the other persons beneficially interested. Ultimately, in October, 1895, Hales was, upon his own confession, convicted at the Old Bailey for forging the name of Joseph Moses Marsh on the back of the cheque for £6,137 8s. 9d. A

Between July, 1895, and Aug. 12, 1895, there had been no communication of any kind between Hales and Clear and Green. It will be seen that at the latter date Hales' fraud was complete; he had got the fund in question out of court and under his control, and two cheques against it had been paid. On that Aug. 12, about one o'clock, Hales called at the office of Clear and Green, and saw the former. Hales reminded Clear of his having spoken to him about some business that he was going to bring to Clear and Green. He said, "It is all done. I did it for you. I did not want to bother you. The cheque is waiting for your costs at the Paymaster-General's." Clear thereupon reprimanded him and asked him what business he had to use his name or the name of the firm. To which Hales replied, "I thought it was such a simple matter that it was not worth while. I thought I could carry it out and instructed counsel, and I have done everything necessary—there was a good man, Mr. Brodie Cooper" (referring to the learned counsel who had appeared for the supposed petitioner). To this Clear replied that he liked to know what was going on; that he did not like people to use their names, and that he had never allowed it on any occasion. Clear in his evidence stated that he did not inquire, nor did Hales tell him, what was the nature of the business in which his name or that of his firm had been used, and that he did not ascertain till a much later period that his name or that of his firm had been used for a petitioner who was seeking payment of money out of court. Ultimately Clear took and cashed the cheque for £15, repaid to Hales £10 14s. 6d. out of its proceeds, which the latter said represented payments by him to counsel, and handed the balance, £4 5s. 6d., in cash, to his partner, J. E. Green, who on the same day entered it thus in the cash-book of the firm:—"Received cash of J. Hales, Re Joseph, £4 5s. 6d." This was the sole connection of Green with the matter. It is to be noted that KEKEWICH, J., accepted as true the foregoing account given by Clear of the facts so far as he was concerned. The learned judge explicitly finds that Clear had no reason to believe that Hales had intended to use or had used his name until Aug. 12, 1895. As to Green, he also explicitly acquits him of all personal blame. I think these conclusions of the learned judge were warranted by the evidence. It is unnecessary to refer to the fact (which seems to me irrelevant in view of these findings) that in January, 1895, Hales asked Clear to "identify" him at the Paymaster-General's office, and that Clear did so. B C D E F G

It remains, in order to complete the story, to narrate the other facts which occurred on Aug. 12 and some facts which occurred after that date. Between one and two o'clock on Aug. 12 a cheque payable to "self" drawn on account at Child's for £4,000 was cashed; on Aug. 13 a like further cheque for £50 was cashed, and on Sept. 14 a like further cheque for £20 was cashed. There then remained (after payment of these cheques) £1,966 0s. 8d. to the credit of the account, and that sum so remained up to October, 1895, when the fraud was discovered, and it has been recovered for the benefit of the persons entitled. Upon this state of facts the persons defrauded petitioned the court for relief against the Paymaster-General or the Commissioners of the Treasury under the Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872 [repealed by Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925]. The claim to this relief was not denied, but on the hearing of the petition it was alleged on the part of the Treasury that Clear and Green were, as officers of the court, liable to make good the moneys lost, and the court was asked so to order. H I

The question then was, before KEKEWICH, J., and now is before us, whether on the facts stated the firm of Clear and Green, or any, and if so, which member of the firm is liable for any, and if so, for what part of the moneys lost. The learned judge, as I understand, acquitted Clear of responsibility in respect of all moneys

A drawn from the account at Child's Bank up to and including Aug. 12. He says expressly that, in his judgment, no action, however energetic, on Clear's part would have availed to stop the payment of the £4,000 cheque on Aug. 12, but he finds that Clear on that day condoned what he (Clear) thought was an irregularity in the use of his name, and the learned judge makes him liable to repay the amount of the £15 cheque, and for any loss for withdrawal from Child's Bank after the date of B Aug. 12. This would represent a liability of Clear for £15, and £50, and £20, in all £85. As to Green, the learned judge, while, as I have said, acquitting him of all personal blame, arrives at the conclusion that Clear was acting within the scope of the partnership authority in what he did, and that therefore Green is subject to the same liability as his partner. From these judgments there are cross-appeals. C Green gave notice of appeal on May 21, 1896, the Crown on May 22, 1896, and Clear on June 10, 1896. On the argument before us the discussion proceeded on the appeal of the Crown, for whom it was contended that the learned judge had rightly found that Clear had on Aug. 12, 1895, condoned or ratified the use of his name, but that the learned judge had failed to carry that conclusion to its legitimate consequences by fixing Clear with the results, which, it was contended, followed upon the use of his name, and that he was legally liable for the entire loss—namely, D £4,171 8s. 1d., and for the cheques of £15 and £10 for costs. It was further contended that Green was likewise liable for the acts of his partner. On the other hand, it was contended for Clear that his liability was limited to the repayment of the amount of the £15 cheque, and for Green that his liability was limited to the £4 5s. 6d. received by him for the partnership.

E We have now to consider these various contentions. No question of jurisdiction was raised before us, but I think it important to state the principal upon which the court acts. It is that, where negligence or other breach of duty is committed by a solicitor, an officer of the court, in a matter in which the court has seisin, the court may, and, if it can do full justice, will, summarily order its officer to make good the loss occasioned by his neglect or breach of duty. But the limit of F liability is the measure of the loss flowing from the negligence or breach of duty. The court cannot, merely because the officer has been guilty of misconduct, mulct him in damages. The damages must flow from the act of negligence or misconduct. In the present case the learned judge has divided the loss into (i) the loss which he considers occurred up to and including Aug. 12, and (ii) that after Aug. 12, and he has fixed Clear and Green with the latter loss only.

G Before considering whether this is correct, it will be convenient to deal with the broader contention of the Crown—viz., that the firm are liable for all the loss whenever it occurred. Apart from the doctrine of ratification, it cannot be pretended that there was any ground for fixing Clear or Green with liability. Neither had done any blameworthy thing. Neither had authorised the use of the firm's name. Neither knew up to Aug. 12 that the firm's name had in fact been used for any H purpose, and when, on that day, Clear learned that it had been used, the mischief had been done, the money had gone out of the control of the court and into that of the perpetrator of the fraud. The money was lost, and the question was not whether the loss could be prevented, but whether any of it could be recovered. How had it been obtained? It had been obtained by reason of the order of the court of July 13, 1895, which in its turn had been obtained by the fraudulent I fabrication of the deed-poll and of the affidavit purporting to verify it, followed by the petition containing untrue statements, and the employment by Hales in Clear's name of counsel for the petitioner to support the petition, and of counsel by Hales in Hales's name to consent to the prayer in the petition. Of all this Clear and Green were ignorant. Indeed it is obvious that, if Hales had not chosen to mention the cheque for £15 to Clear, in order to get out of it the fees paid to counsel, the fraud would have been equally successful and complete; or, again, if he had used the firm's name without any such conversation as occurred in July.

What, then, is the true effect of what takes place on Aug. 12? To appreciate this one must recur to the conversation in July, when Clear was asked by Hales A whether he would act for a formal party and said he would if instructed. On Aug. 12 Hales in effect says to Clear, "I did not think it worth troubling you about the formal business I mentioned in July. It was simple; I did it myself. There is a cheque for £15 for you, but you will have to return me all for counsel's fees which I have paid, except £4 5s. 6d., which you keep for yourself." Clear complained of the use of his name, reprimanded Hales, but kept and paid to his B partner this £4 5s. 6d. I doubt whether this is any ratification in any real sense; but assuming that it amounts to ratification, of what is it ratification? At most it was ratification of the use of his name in a formal matter for a formal party. Is that enough to fix him with liability for what had been fraudulently done by Hales for his own purposes? I think not. Clear did not know that his name had been used for the petitioner, nor that the object of the petition was to obtain C payment out of a fund in court. The amount of the cheque was not such as to suggest that the work had been other than the employment of counsel for a formal purpose, as for a change of investments or appointment of new trustees, or the like. In a word, there was nothing to suggest in the remotest way that Hales had for his own fraudulent purposes used Clear's name and been a party to forgery and perjury in effecting those purposes. We are not called upon to act in business as if every D man with whom we come into relations is a thief, and, therefore, men's actions are not to be judged by a standard of unbelief in professional honesty.

To constitute a binding adoption of acts a priori unauthorised these conditions must exist: (i) The acts must have been done for and in the name of the supposed principal; and (ii) there must be proved full knowledge of what those acts were, or such an unqualified adoption that the inference may properly be drawn that the E principal intended to take upon himself the responsibility for such acts, whatever they were. In the present case, although the name of Clear (J. Clear & Co.) was used, it is apparent that that user and the other fraudulent acts of Hales were done for his own purposes. It is admitted that Clear had no knowledge of the fraud which had been committed, and, in my judgment, it is impossible properly to draw F the conclusion that Clear, by taking the cheque for £15 and keeping the £4 5s. 6d., intended unqualifiedly to take upon himself the responsibility for what had been done, however wickedly and fraudulently it had been done. To use the language of KEKEWICH, J., he condoned what he believed was a mere irregularity. Where the supposed ratification relates to acts as to which there is no pretence of any a priori authority, as in this case, where it is not a question merely of excess of G authority, full knowledge of the facts and unequivocal adoption after such knowledge must be proved, or, in the alternative, the circumstances of the alleged ratification must be such as to warrant the clear inference that the principal was adopting the supposed agent's acts, whatever they were or however culpable they were. I find an absence of such knowledge and an absence of any ratification except this—putting it at the highest—a ratification of the use of the name of the H firm for a formal party. Such ratification is not enough to fix Clear or Green with the fraudulent acts of forgery and perjury, or with the fraudulent statements in the petition to which Hales, to further his own ends, was a party. It follows from what I have said that, even if Clear had a priori authorised the use of his name for a formal party, he would not be responsible for the acts of fraud and forgery committed in this case by his supposed agent for that agent's own fraudulent I purposes.

In my judgment, therefore, the contention of the Crown fails as against both Clear and Green. It remains to consider whether KEKEWICH, J., was right in fixing Clear and Green with the loss (as it is called) after Aug. 12 as well as with the amount of the £15 cheque. First as to Clear. Obviously the judgment must stand against Clear for the £15. He received the cheque for £15, part of the fund in court fraudulently obtained, and he has not validly discharged himself of it. As to the rest, I have already pointed out that, in my judgment, the loss

A was complete when the cheque of the Paymaster-General was credited as cash by Child's Bank, on Aug. 10, two days before Clear knew that the firm's name had been used, and that the only question then was whether any of that loss could be recovered back. I understand the learned judge to have proceeded on the ground that Clear had failed in his duty in not promptly informing the court that his name had been used without his authority. But assuming for the moment this failure of duty, did it prevent the recovery of any part of the money? It is said it did, for that, if he had informed the court, a stop would have been put upon the account at Child's Bank, and the cheques for £50 on Aug. 13 and for £20 on Sept. 14 would not have been honoured. Is this so? I agree that Clear ought to have resented as grossly improper the unauthorised use of his name. Suppose he had said so in stronger terms than he did to Hales, and added, as many men acting on a high standard of professional conduct would have done: "I will straightway inform the court," is it not probable that Hales would at once have withdrawn the bank balance? Is it not further probable that the balance of £1,965 0s. 5d. which was recovered was allowed to remain because Hales was, in the absence of any threat of this kind, lulled into a false sense of security? Indeed, if Clear had gone to the court, all that he could have said was that he thought it proper to state that his name had been used without authority, but whether used for any improper purpose he could not say, and some time must have been occupied by inquiring before any action could be taken, and meanwhile, it is not probable Hales would have been idle.

I cannot see my way, therefore, to the conclusion that Clear's silence in any sense led to any part of the loss. But further, to hold Clear liable to make good the £50 and £20 drawn out from Child's Bank after Aug. 12 can only, in my judgment, be right upon the assumption that Clear knew or ought to have suspected that a dishonest use had been made of his name and that prompt action would, or might, prevent or lessen any loss following upon that dishonest use. But Clear had no knowledge or even suspicion of anything of the sort. To hold him liable for the sums is to hold him responsible for a breach of duty which is not imposed by any known legal principle, and which the court is not warranted in imposing on its officers. To do so would be too oppressive on honest men desirous of doing right.

This conclusion is quite consistent with cases relied upon by counsel for the Crown, for in all of them the solicitor who was held liable for money improperly obtained out of court had done far more than Clear did in this case. In Slater v. Slater (1) the solicitor had allowed his name to be used for the petitioner upon whose application the money was obtained, and that solicitor actually received the money. So, in Re Dangar's Trusts (2) the solicitor held liable was the solicitor for the petitioner who obtained the money; he took an active part in obtaining the money, and his negligence, or that of his clerk, caused the loss. In Re Ward (3) and in Todd v. Studholme (4) the solicitor had the conduct of the suit, and was held liable for his negligence in it. In Re Spencer (5) the solicitors had acted for the petitioners, and their negligence caused the loss for which they were held liable. In Brydges v. Branfill (6) the solicitors were the solicitors for the petitioners, and they received the money. Clear's conduct does not bring him within the principles applicable to any of these decisions.

As to Green, it follows from what I have said that as to him the question is narrowed to this—is he liable jointly and severally with Clear for the £15, or only for the £4 5s. 6d. which he received from Clear, and paid into the bank account of the firm as part of the partnership assets? That he is liable for the £4 5s. 6d. is obvious, and upon the grounds which apply to the £15 cheque in the case of Clear. Is he liable for anything more? I think he is not. The learned judge, as I gather, proceeded on the ground that it was within the scope of the agency authority created by the partnership for one partner to allow the use of the name of the firm by another solicitor, and thereby to bind his co-partner. Is that sound? As a proposition of law I know of no authority for it, and I confess I should be surprised to find that it was usual to do so. But any such usage must be established by evidence; the court cannot, as a matter of law, say that there is any such usage, and I do not find that in this case any evidence to that effect was given or offered. Indeed, in this case, the question is not merely whether the permission to use the firm's name was within the scope of the partnership authority, but whether it was within such authority to ratify ex post facto the unauthorised use of such name.

In the absence of any evidence of usage or course of business on these points, I come to the conclusion that the £15 cheque received by Clear was not received by him in respect of any transaction in which he had a right to engage on behalf of the firm. The receipt of the cheque was not the receipt of the firm, nor was Clear's knowledge of the receipt and of the circumstances under which he received it the knowledge of the firm. Green's liability began and ended with the receipt by him from Clear of the £4 5s. 6d. cash, and is confined to that sum. The result, therefore, in my judgment, is that Clear's liability must be reduced to the sum of £15, and of Green to the sum of £4 5s. 6d., part of the £15, and the order appealed from must be varied accordingly. As regards the costs of these proceedings, the costs of and consequent on the petition of the petitioners and the respondents, other than the Paymaster-General and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and other than Hales, Clear, and Green, and except so far as such costs have been increased by the conduct of the Paymaster-General and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are to come out of the fund in court. The costs of the petitioners and the respondents, other than Hales, Clear, and Green, so far as they have been so increased as aforesaid, are to be paid by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury. The commissioners are to pay the costs of their appeal to Clear and Green and the parties interested in the fund, and no costs of Clear's appeal and of Green's appeal. Clear and Green must be relieved of the costs which they were ordered to pay in the court below, but they cannot have any costs there.

No use of property which would be legal if due to a proper motive can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper, selfish, or even malicious.

Accordingly, where a landowner caused works to be done on his land which had the effect of diverting percolating water under his land from flowing to neighbouring land from which a water authority drew water for its service, the authority having acquired no interest in the water under the landowner's land,

Held: the lawful act of the landowner was not rendered unlawful even if he had done it with the sole object of compelling the authority to acquire rights in the water under his land at his own price.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.), reported [1895] 1 Ch. 145, reversing a decision of NORTH, J.

The action was brought by the appellants to restrain the respondent from making or continuing a drift or tunnel in his lands situate near East Many Wells, in the parish of Bradford, Yorkshire, whereby the waters of certain springs and underground streams, known as "Many Wells," to which the appellants alleged they were entitled under certain Acts of Parliament, might be diverted, drawn off, or diminished in quantity. The appellants were authorised by the Bradford Corporation Waterworks Act, 1854, to purchase the undertaking of the Bradford Waterworks Co., who had acquired the exclusive right to springs and streams of water arising or flowing in and through farm lands and grounds called Trooper Farm. The respondent was the owner of a farm immediately adjoining Trooper Farm, and on higher ground. He had been advised that large quantities of stone and other minerals on his farm could be profitably worked if the land could be kept drained and cleared of water without the expense of pumping-engines. The appellants alleged that the action which he took to effect this would result in underground water being diverted from their land. A

Their Lordships took time for consideration. B

July 29, 1895. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this action the plaintiffs seek to restrain the defendant from doing certain acts which they allege will interfere with the supply of water which they want, and are incorporated to collect, for the purpose of better supplying the town of Bradford. NORTH, J., ordered the injunction to issue, but the Court of Appeal, consisting of LORD HERSHELL, L.C., and LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., reversed his judgment. C

The facts that are material to the decision of this question seem to me to lie in a very narrow compass. The acts done, or sought to be done, by the defendant were all done upon his own land, and the interference, whatever it is, with the flow of water is an interference with water which is underground and not shown to be water flowing in any defined stream, but is percolating water, which, but for such interference, would undoubtedly reach the plaintiffs' works, and in that sense it does deprive them of the water which they would otherwise get. But although it does deprive them of water which they would otherwise get, it is necessary for the plaintiffs to establish that they have a right to the flow of water, and that the defendant had no right to do what he is doing. I am of opinion that neither of those propositions can be established. Apart from the consideration of the particular Act of Parliament incorporating the plaintiffs, which requires separate treatment, the question whether the plaintiffs have a right to the flow of such water appears to me to be covered by authority. In Chasemore v. Richards (1) it became necessary for this House to decide whether an owner of land had a right to sink a well upon his own premises, and thereby abstract the subterranean water percolating through his own soil, which would otherwise, by the natural force of gravity, have found its way into springs which fed the river Wandle, the flow of which the plaintiff in that action had enjoyed for upwards of sixty years. The very question was then determined by this House, and it was held that the landowner had a right to do what he had done, whatever his object or purpose might be, and although the purpose might be wholly unconnected with the enjoyment of his own estate. It, therefore, appears to me that, treating this question apart from s. 49 of the Act of Parliament upon which the whole question turns, it would be absolutely hopeless to contend that this case is not governed by the authority of Chasemore v. Richards (1). D E F G

This brings me back to s. 49 of the Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854, on which reliance has been placed. That section is as follows: H

“It shall not be lawful for any person other than the company to divert, alter, or appropriate in any other manner than by law they may be legally entitled, any of the waters supplying or flowing from certain streams and springs called ‘Many Wells,’ arising or flowing in and through a certain farm called ‘Trooper’ or ‘Many Wells’ Farm, in the township of Wilsden, in the parish of Bradford, or to sink any well or pit, or do any act, matter, or thing whereby the waters of the said springs may be drawn off or diminished in quantity, and if any person shall illegally divert, alter, or appropriate the said water, or any part thereof, or sink any such well or pit, or shall do any other act, matter, or thing whereby the said waters may be drawn off or diminished in quantity, and shall not immediately on being required so to do by the company repair the injury done by him so as to restore the said springs and I

A the waters thereof to the state they were in before such illegal act as aforesaid, he shall forfeit to the company a sum not exceeding £5 for every day during which the said supply of water shall be diverted or diminished by reason of any work done or act performed by, or by the authority of, such person, in addition to the damage which the company may sustain by reason of their supply of water being diminished."

B Whatever may be said of the drafting of this section, two things are clear: first, that the section in its terms contemplates that persons other than the company may be legally entitled to divert, alter, or appropriate the waters supplying or flowing from the streams and springs; and, secondly, that the acts against which the section is directed must be illegal diversion, alteration, or appropriation of the
C said waters. The natural interpretation of such language seems to me to be that, whereas the generality of the language of the section might apply to any alteration or appropriation of waters supplying or flowing from the streams and springs called "Many Wells," the section only intended to protect such streams and springs and supplies as the company should have acquired a right to by purchase, compensation, or otherwise; but in such wise as should vest in them the proprietorship of the waters, D streams, springs, etc. And, lest the generality of the language should give them more than that to which they had acquired the proprietary right, the legal rights of all other persons were expressly saved. Upon this assumption the latter part of the section makes penal the illegal diversion, alteration, or appropriation of any streams, etc., of which, by the hypothesis, the company had become the proprietor. I do not think that NORTH, J., does justice to the language of the section when he
E says that

"the section enacts that a man is not to do certain specified things except so far as he may lawfully do them."

The fallacy of that observation (with all respect to NORTH, J.) resides in the phrase "certain specified things." If my reading of the section be correct, the thing that
F is prohibited is taking or diverting water which has been appropriated and paid for by the company; but the thing which is not prohibited is taking water which has not reached the company's premises, to the property in which no title is given by the section, and which, by the very act complained of, never can reach the company's premises at all.

To use popular language, therefore, what is prohibited is taking what belongs
G to the company, and what is not prohibited is taking what does not belong to the company. I have used popular language because I have no doubt that the draftsman who drew the section was encountered with the proposition in his own mind that you could not absolutely assert property in percolating water at all. You may have a right to the flow of water; you may have a property in the water when it is collected and appropriated and reduced into possession; but in view of the particular
I subject-matter with which the draftsman was dealing, it seems to me intelligible enough why he adopted the phraseology now under construction. It appears to me that this is the true construction of the section from the language itself. But I confess I can entertain no doubt that the mere fact that the section as construed by the plaintiffs affords no right to compensation to those whose rights might be affected, is conclusive against the construction contended for by the plaintiffs.

I The only remaining point is the question of fact alleged by the plaintiffs, that the acts done by the defendant are done not with any view which deals with the use of his own land or the percolating water through it, but is done, in the language of the pleader, "maliciously." I am not certain that I can understand or give any intelligible construction to the word so used. Upon the supposition on which I am now arguing, it comes to an allegation that the defendant did maliciously something that he had a right to do. If this question were to have been tried in old times as an injury to the right in an action on the case the plaintiff would have had to allege, and to prove, if traversed, that he was entitled to the flow of the water which, as I have already said, was an allegation he would have failed to establish. This is not a case in which the state of mind of the person doing the act can affect the right to do it. If it was a lawful act, however ill the motive might be, he had a right to do it. If it was an unlawful act, however good his motive might be, he would have no right to do it. Motives and intentions in such a question as is now before your Lordships seem to me to be absolutely irrelevant. But I am not prepared to adopt LINDLEY, L.J.'s, view of the moral obliquity of the person insisting on his right when that right is challenged. It is not an uncommon thing to stop up a path which may be a convenience to everybody else, and the use of which may be no inconvenience to the owner of the land over which the path goes. But when the use of it is insisted upon as a right it is a familiar mode of testing that right to stop the permissive use, which the owner of the land would contend it to be, although the use may form no inconvenience to the owner. So, here, if the owner of the adjoining land is in a situation in which an act of his, lawfully done on his own land, may divert the water which otherwise would go into the possession of the original trading company, I see no reason why he should not insist on their purchasing his interest from which the original trading company desires to make profit. For these reasons, my Lords, I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant the costs both here and below.

LORD WATSON.—The appellants have purchased under statutory powers, and are now vested with the whole undertaking of the Bradford Waterworks Co., incorporated by an Act which transferred to that company the undertaking of a corporation having the same name, created by statute in 1842, together with all rights and privileges thereto belonging. The older of these companies acquired for the purposes of their undertaking a parcel of land known as "Trooper Farm," and also certain springs or streams arising in or flowing through the farm. From these springs and streams the appellants and their predecessors have hitherto obtained a valuable supply of water for the domestic use of the inhabitants of Bradford. Trooper Farm is bounded on the west and north by lands belonging to the respondent, which are about 140 acres in extent. The first of these boundaries, on the west—which alone is of importance in the present case—is a public highway called "Doll's Lane." The respondent's land to the west of that boundary is on a higher level than Trooper Farm, and has a steep slope downwards to the lane. Its substrata are intersected by two faults running east and west—one at each end of the boundary—which prevent the escape of percolating water either to the north or south, and the nature and the inclination of the strata are such that the subterraneous water which they contain must, by the natural force of gravitation, eventually find its way to Trooper Farm. The sources from which the appellants derive a supply of water near to the western boundary of Trooper Farm are two in number. The first of these is a large spring, known as "Many Wells," which issues from their ground twenty or thirty yards to the east of Doll's Lane; the second is a stream to the south of "Many Wells," which has its origin in a smaller spring on the respondent's land, close to Doll's Lane, at a point known as the "Watering Place," from which the water flows in a definite channel into Trooper Farm. It is an admitted fact that neither the appellants, nor either of the companies whose undertaking is now vested in them, ever acquired from the respondent, or his predecessors in title, any part of their legal right to, or interest in, the water in their land, whether above or below the ground; and also that the statutes—to the benefit of whose provisions the appellants are now entitled—make no provision for compensating the respondent in the event of such right or interest being prejudicially affected by the appellants' undertaking.

In the year 1892 the respondent began to sink a shaft on the other side of the land to the west of "Many Wells" spring, and also to drive a level through his land adjoining the lane, for the professed purpose of draining the strata, with a view to the working of his minerals. These operations had the effect of occasionally discolouring the water in the "Many Wells" spring, and also of diminishing to some extent the amount of water in that spring, and in the stream coming from the "Watering Place"; and it became apparent that, if persevered in, they would result in a considerable and permanent diminution of the water supply obtainable from these sources. The appellants then brought the present suit, in which they crave an injunction to restrain the respondent from continuing to sink the shaft or drive the level, and from doing anything whereby the waters of the spring and stream might be drawn off, or diminished in quantity, or polluted, or injuriously affected.

It is clear that, apart from any privilege which may have been conferred upon them by statute, the respondent, as in a question with the appellants, has a legal right to divert or impound the water percolating beneath the surface of his land, so as to prevent it from reaching Trooper Farm, and feeding, or assisting to feed, the "Many Wells" spring, or the stream flowing from the Watering Place. Upon that point there can be no doubt, since Chasemore v. Richards (1) was decided by this House in the year 1859. But the appellants argued at your Lordships' Bar, as they did in both courts below, that the principle of Chasemore v. Richards (1) is inapplicable to the present case, because, in the first place, the operations contemplated and commenced by the respondent are expressly prohibited by statute; and, in the second place, these operations were designed and partly carried out by the respondent not with the honest intention of improving the value of his lands or minerals, but with the sole object of doing injury to their undertaking.

The statutory provisions upon which the appellants rely as supporting the first of these pleas are to be found in s. 234 of the Act of 1842, and in s. 49 of the Act of 1854, which is a mere repetition of the previous enactment. The clause relates to the Many Wells springs, an expression which, as the context shows, includes the stream coming from the Watering Place. It contains two separate enactments, one of them prohibitory, and the other penal. First of all, it declares that it shall not be lawful

"for any person other than the said company to divert, alter, or appropriate in any manner other than by law they may be legally entitled"

any of the water "supplying or flowing from" these springs, or to sink any well or pit, or to do any act, matter, or thing whereby "the waters of the said springs" may be drawn off or diminished in quantity. That declaration is followed by the provision that,

"if any person shall illegally divert, alter, or appropriate the said water or any part thereof, or sink any such well or pit, or shall do any such act, matter, or thing whereby the said waters shall be drawn off or diminished in quantity."

and shall not, on being required to do so by the company, immediately restore the springs and waters to the same condition in which they were before the alleged act, they shall be liable to pay £5 to the company for each day until restoration is made, besides compensating the company for any damage sustained through their illegal act.

The appellants endeavoured to construe the prohibitory clause as effecting a virtual confiscation in their favour of all water rights in or connected with the respondent's land lying to the west of Trooper Farm. It appears to me to be exceedingly improbable that the legislature should have intended to deprive a landowner of part of his property for the benefit of a commercial company without any provision for compensating him for his loss. But it is not necessary to rely upon probabilities, because, in my opinion, the language of the clause is incapable of bearing such an interpretation. I think that the plain object of the statutory prohibition, which has two distinct branches, was to give protection to the supply of water which had been acquired by or belonged to the company for the time being, and that it was not meant to forbid, and does not prevent, any legitimate use made by a neighbour- A ing proprietor of water running upon or percolating below his land before it reached the company's supply and became part of their undertaking. The first branch makes it unlawful for any person other than the company to divert, alter, or appropriate any of the "waters now supplying" the Many Wells springs, which appear to include sources of supply existing upon lands adjacent to Trooper Farm.

 Had the prohibition been absolute it would have struck against the operations of B the respondent; but it is subject to the qualification that the respondent, or any landowner similarly situated, may lawfully divert those waters which ultimately feed the Many Wells springs, so long as he does so in any manner which is not in excess of his common law rights. The respondent's operations, of which the appellants' complain, are within his proprietary right, and are, therefore, not obnoxious to that part of the prohibition. The second branch, which prohibits the C sinking of wells and other operations, has no reference to outside waters, more or less distant, which might ultimately find their way to the Many Wells springs.
 It relates to "the waters of the said springs," an expression which, in my opinion, can only denote the waters which have actually reached the Many Wells springs, or some channel or reservoir which has been prepared for their reception upon their D issuing from those springs. The prohibition gives effectual protection against the withdrawal or diminution, either by an adjacent proprietor or any other person, of waters which have come within the dominion of the appellants. But it does not prevent the diversion or impounding by an adjacent proprietor of water in his own land which has never reached that point, so long as his operations are such as the law permits. For these reasons, in so far as concerns the first plea urged for the appellants, I concur in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. E

The second plea argued by the appellants, which was rejected by both courts below, was founded upon the text of the Roman law (DIG. lib. 39, tit. 3, art. 1, s. 12), and also, somewhat to my surprise, upon the law of Scotland. I venture to doubt whether the doctrine of Marcellus would assist the appellants' contention in this case; but it is unnecessary to consider the point, because the noble and learned F Lords who took part in the decision of Chasemore v. Richards (1) held that the doctrine had no place in the law of England. I desire, however, to say that I cannot assent to the law of Scotland as laid down by LORD WENSLEYDALE in Chase- more v. Richards (1) (7 H.L. Cas. at p. 388). The noble and learned Lord appears to have accepted a passage in BELL'S PRINCIPLES (s. 966), which is expressed in very general terms, and is calculated to mislead unless it is read in the light of the G decisions upon which it is founded. I am aware that the phrase in aemulationem vicini was at one time frequently, and is even now occasionally, used very loosely by Scottish lawyers. But I know of no case in which the act of a proprietor has been found to be illegal, or restrained as being in aemulationem, where it was not attended with offence or injury to his neighbour. In cases of nuisance a degree of indulgence has been extended to certain operations, such as burning limestone, H which in law are regarded as necessary evils. If a landowner proceeded to burn limestone close to his march, so as to cause annoyance to his neighbour, there being other places on his property where he could conduct the operation with equal, or greater, convenience to himself, and without giving cause of offence, the court would probably grant an interdict. But the principle of aemulatio has never been carried further. The law of Scotland, if it differs in that, is in all other respects I the same as the law of England. No use of property which would be legal if due to a proper motive can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper, or even malicious. I, therefore, concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. To my mind the case is clear, and turns upon considerations sufficiently simple, and far from obscure. The appellants have no case, unless they can show that they are entitled to the flow of the water in

A question, and that the respondent has no right to do what he is doing. Putting aside the statutes, the respondent's rights cannot be seriously contested. The law stated by this House in Chasemore v. Richards (1) cannot be questioned. The respondent has acted within his legal rights throughout, and is he to forfeit those legal rights, and be punished for their legal exercise, because certain motives are imputed to him? If his motives were the most generous and philanthropic in the world, they would not avail him when his actions were illegal. If his motives are selfish and mercenary, that is no reason why his rights should be confiscated when his actions are legal. It is to be noted that the respondent or his predecessors in title never parted with any of their legal rights; it is not suggested that the appellants, by agreement or otherwise, ever acquired them; and no indication is given that there is an intention to compensate the respondent for his legal rights sought to be appropriated, or injuriously affected, by the appellants. The appellants' contention on the construction of the statutes would practically confiscate the respondent's water rights. I see nothing in the statutes to interfere with, or prejudice, his legal rights. Very clear words would be required to support the contention that legal rights have been swept away without compensation. Waters that have come under the control of the appellants are fully protected, but there is not a word to hinder or cramp the action of the respondent unless he acts "illegally" or proceeds in any manner "other than by law he may be legally entitled." I, therefore, concur in the order proposed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—For fifty years the corporation of Bradford have supplied their town with water. They were empowered to do so by an Act of Parliament passed in 1854, which authorized and required them to purchase the undertaking of a then existing company called "The Bradford Waterworks Co." The chief source of their water supply was taken over from that company. It comes from a cluster of springs known as "The Many Wells." These springs issue from the lower slope of a hill-side at some distance from the town. Above them, in the immediate neighbourhood, there is a tract of land belonging to the respondent, Mr. Pickles. Owing to the fall of the ground and the nature and lie of the strata beneath the surface, Mr. Pickles' land forms a sort of gathering room or reservoir for subterranean water. Two faults, nearly parallel to each other, run downwards through it, and there is a bottom of impermeable clay. At present there is no way of escape for the imprisoned waters except by the Many Wells springs. Within the orbit of his own land Mr. Pickles has set about making a tunnel or drift which, apparently, is intended to pierce one of the two faults that keep the underground water within bounds. If this is done, the result, it is said, will be to allow the water to run off in some other direction. The corporation claim an injunction to restrain Mr. Pickles from going on with the proposed works. They put their case in two ways. They say that under the circumstances the operation which Mr. Pickles threatens to carry out is something in excess of his rights as a landowner. Failing that ground, they maintain that his proceedings are in contravention of the express terms of their special Act.

As regards the first point, the position of the appellants is one which it is not very easy to understand. They cannot dispute the law laid down by this House in Chasemore v. Richards (1). They do not suggest that the underground water with which Mr. Pickles proposes to deal flows in any defined channel. But they say that Mr. Pickles' action in the matter is malicious, and that, because his motive is a bad one, he is not at liberty to do a thing which every landowner in the country may do with impunity if his motives are good. Mr. Pickles, it seems, was so much alarmed at this view of the case that he tried to persuade the court that all that he wanted was to drain some beds of stone which he thought that he could work at a profit. In his innocent enterprise the court found a sinister design; and it may be taken that his real objective was to show that he was master of the situation, and to force the corporation to buy him out at a price satisfactory to himself. Well, he has something to sell, or at any rate he has something which he can prevent other people from enjoying unless he is paid for it. Why should he, he may think, without fee or reward, keep his land as a storeroom for a commodity which the corporation dispense, probably not gratuitously, to the inhabitants of Bradford? He prefers his own interests to the public good. He may be churlish, selfish, and grasping. His conduct may seem shocking to a moral philosopher. But where is the malice? Mr. Pickles has no spite against the people of Bradford. He bears no ill-will to the corporation. They are welcome to the water, and to his land, too, if they will pay his price for it. So much, perhaps, might be said in defence or in palliation of his conduct. But the real answer to the claim of the corporation is that in such a case motives are immaterial. It is the act, not the motive for the act, that must be regarded. If the act, apart from motive, gives rise merely to damage without legal injury, the motive, however reprehensible it may be, will not supply that element. On this point both NORTH, J., and the Court of Appeal decided against the corporation; and the decision, as it seems to me, is plainly right.

On the second point, in which NORTH, J., was in favour of the corporation, and the Court of Appeal against them, there is certainly more to be said. I quite agree with the Court of Appeal in the result at which they have arrived; but, speaking for myself, I rather take leave to doubt whether the section of the special Act, on which the question turns, is so unsatisfactorily drawn, and so difficult to construe, as it seemed to be to the Court of Appeal. The old waterworks company was incorporated by an Act passed in 1842. It was dissolved and re-incorporated in 1854 in view of the immediate transfer of the undertaking to the corporation. In the Act of 1854, the provisions of which were kept in force for the benefit of the corporation, the section in question is the 49th. But that section is merely a reproduction of s. 234 in the Act of 1842, and it will be more convenient to deal with the earlier Act. The Act of 1842 scheduled certain lands which the company were empowered to take. Among them was part of a farm belonging to one Seth Wright, which was known as "Trooper" or "Many Wells" Farm. By s. 233 the company were authorised to divert or alter the course of a certain beck called "Hewenden Beck," which is a tributary of the river Aire, "and also to divert and take the water from" the Many Wells springs, described as "the springs and streams of water called Many Wells rising or flowing in and through . . . Trooper or Many Wells Farm." At the date of the passing of the Act the water issuing from the Many Wells springs in Trooper Farm, and a stream which rose in the adjoining land, flowed in several defined channels through Trooper Farm into Hewenden Beck, which forms one of the boundaries of the farm. The scheduled portion of the farm comprised apparently some, but not all, of those channels.

However, after the Act was passed, the company purchased the whole of Trooper Farm, and, as required by the Act, they made compensation to the mill-owners on Hewenden Beck for the loss of the waters of the Many Wells springs. Section 234 is a protective clause corresponding in the main with s. 14 in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. It was to come into operation after the purchase of the Many Wells springs. According to the ordinary course of legislation in this country, a clause of that sort is intended to protect property, rights, and interests which have been acquired by purchase, not to transfer arbitrarily from one person to another property and rights for which nothing has been paid, and for which no compensation is provided. Section 234 prohibits in terms two classes of acts, and it imposes a penalty not exceeding £5 per day on any person infringing its provisions so long as the injury lasts. One of these classes is treated as legal or illegal, according to circumstances; the other is treated as illegal under all circumstances.

In the first place, the section says that

"after the Many Wells springs have been purchased by the company, it shall not be lawful for any person, other than the said company, to divert, alter, or appropriate in any other manner than by law they may be legally entitled, any of the waters now supplying or flowing from the same."

Both as regards the underground sources of the springs, and as regards the streams flowing from them in their natural course, it forbids any act by any person in excess of his legal rights. At that time, it must be remembered that the rights of landowners in regard to underground water had not been finally determined. If the view which commended itself to the Court of Exchequer in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (2) had been established, the proposed action of Mr. Pickles would, no doubt, have been illegal. As it is, there is nothing in the first part of the prohibition to restrict or curtail his rights as a landowner in dealing with underground water percolating through his land in unknown channels.

In the second place, the section declares that no person but the company is

“to sink any well or pit, or do any act, matter, or thing whereby the waters of the said springs may be drawn off or diminished in quantity.”

What is the meaning of the expression “the water of the said springs?” The natural and obvious meaning seems to me to be the waters issuing from the springs, such as they happen to be in quantity and volume, at the point of issue, or in one case at the point of entry, into Trooper Farm. The expression cannot include the underground sources which serve to feed the springs. Otherwise you would have this singular result, that things which by reason of the saving of existing rights, are treated as legal and permissible in one part of the clause, are treated as illegal and prohibited by another. It must mean the water which the company were authorised to “divert and take from” those springs which the section at its commencement assumes the company to have purchased; not the waters which supply the springs, but the waters which the springs supply. A comparison of other sections in the Act will confirm this view if any confirmation is required. The expression “The waters of the said ‘Many Wells’ ” occurs in s. 275, and then it is evidently synonymous with the following words in a parallel passage in s. 238,

“the water issuing from the springs of water before-mentioned called ‘Many Wells,’ and which is hereby authorised to be taken and diverted for the purposes of this Act.”

After the company had compensated the millowners on Hewenden Beck and purchased Trooper Farm, the waters of the Many Wells springs at and from the point of issue in Trooper Farm, and the water of the stream which rose in the adjoining land at and from the point of its entry into Trooper Farm, became the absolute property of the company, and it was the duty of the company to carry those waters to Bradford. No one was to interfere with them. Any such interference is characterised, in a later part of the section, as an illegal act. And, indeed, it seems to me very difficult to conceive how such an act could in any case be legal, unless the company constructed their works in a perverse and foolish manner. No one from whom the company acquired land or even an easement for the purposes of their works could lawfully let down those works. No one else, it may be assumed, would be in a position to do so. No one could lawfully tap their aqueducts or conduits.

I am of opinion that the act which Mr. Pickles proposes to do is not within either of the two classes of prohibited acts mentioned in s. 234. It is not within the first class, because at the time of the passing of the Act his predecessor was legally entitled, and he is now legally entitled, to do the thing which is complained of. It is not within the second class, because Mr. Pickles does not propose to do anything which can have the effect of drawing off or diminishing in quantity the waters of the Many Wells springs, such as they may be at the point of issue in Trooper Farm, or as regards the stream which does not rise in Trooper Farm at the point of its entry into that farm. It was argued somewhat faintly that s. 49 of the Act of 1854 must have a wider meaning than that which I think ought to be attributed to s. 234 of the Act of 1842, because the Act of 1854 incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and s. 14 of that Act covers, it is said, everything which is covered by s. 234 of the Act of 1842 if it be construed as it seems to me it ought to be construed. There would be very little in such an argument under any circumstances, because it is only natural that the promoters of the legislation of 1854 would on the reconstruction of the company desire to retain or re-enact every clause in the former Act which could make for their protection. But the truth is, that the section of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which corresponds with s. 49 of the Act of 1854, does not apply to the Many Wells springs which were purchased under the Act of 1842. The Act of 1854, which incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, declares that, in construing that Act, the expression "the special Act" shall mean the Act of 1854. It does not mean or include the Act of 1842. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Re BOARDS. KNIGHT v. KNIGHT

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), January 18, 1895]

Will—Legacy—Abatement—Bequest of legacies coupled with gift of residue—Gift of residue charged primarily on personalty—No direction for payment of legacies out of mixed fund—Charge on realty in aid of personalty.

The testator gave, among other legacies, a legacy to a charity of the residue of an annuity fund for which, under the terms of the will, as construed, the personal estate was primarily liable and not a mixed fund comprising the net proceeds of the sale of real and personal estate. Both the legacies and the annuity were charged on the real estate only to the extent of any deficiency in the personal estate and there was no direction for their payment out of the mixed fund.

Held: the legacy to the charity must abate only in the proportion which the value of the impure personalty bore to that of the pure personalty and to the extent to which it was necessary to resort to the proceeds of sale of the real estate in aid of the personalty for payment of the legacies.

- C Originating Summons by the trustees of the testator's will to determine: (i) whether the annuity fund created by the testator was payable primarily out of personal estate, and was only payable out of realty in the event of a deficiency of the personal estate to make up the fund (in which case the legacy to the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution must abate in the proportion which, at the testator's death, the impure personalty bore to the pure personalty and also to the extent to which it was necessary to resort to the real estate for payment of the legacies charged on the fund); or whether the annuity fund was a blended fund consisting of personal estate and the proceeds of sale of real estate (in which case the last-mentioned charitable legacy must abate in the proportion which, at the testator's death, the realty and impure personalty bore to the whole estate); and (ii) who was entitled to so much of the legacy to the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution as that charity was not entitled to take.

The defendants were Edward Boards Knight, the residuary legatee; the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution, a legatee; executors of the heir-at-law and next of kin.

- F Edward Boards, by his will dated Jan. 9, 1878, after giving certain pecuniary legacies to his trustees and executors and his furniture to his wife as therein mentioned, proceeded :

"I also bequeath unto my wife a legacy of £2,000, and a life annuity of £400 sterling."

- G And the testator then bequeathed further pecuniary legacies, including two charitable legacies, and directed that the two charitable legacies should be paid in precedence of the other legacies bequeathed out of such part of his personal estate as the law permitted to be appropriated by will to charitable purposes. He directed that the annuity to his wife should be payable quarterly during her life. He also directed his trustees and executors to purchase, appropriate, and set apart as soon as convenient after his decease, a sufficient fund or sufficient funds for answering the annuity, and that such funds might consist partly of any of the stocks, shares, or securities, forming part of his personal estate at the time of his decease, but so, nevertheless, that his wife should not be prejudiced by reason of the failure of any of his stocks, shares, or securities set apart to meet the annuity, and any deficiency occasioned by such failure should be made up out of the capital devoted to such annuity, and he empowered his trustees and executors to vary and transpose from time to time as they should deem advisable the stocks and securities upon which his estate should at any time be invested. After directing his trustees and executors to sell his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates as soon as convenient after his decease, and for facilitating the sale thereof, devising and bequeathing to his trustees all his freehold and leasehold lands and tenements, the testator directed his trustees and executors for the time being (subject to the discretion given to them as to the annuity) to convert all his residuary personal effects into money as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, and he directed them to stand possessed of the net proceeds arising from the sale and conversion of his real and personal estate and effects (after and subject to the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies, and, after making due provision for the annuity) upon trust for Edward Boards Knight. The testator further directed as to the funds and personal effects set apart to answer the annuity bequeathed, that the same, after the death of his wife or the cesser of the annuity, should fall into and form part of his residuary estate, and be held accordingly upon trust for the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution of England, meaning thereby the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution.

The testator died on Nov. 11, 1878, and his will was proved on Dec. 17 of the same year. His widow, Kate Boards, died on April 5, 1894. The fund appropriated to meet the widow's annuity consisted of the sum of £11,428 11s. 6d. India Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock standing in the names of the trustees. The testator's personal estate proving insufficient, it was purchased partly from the proceeds of sale of real estate, and partly from pure and impure personalty. In the residuary account the value of the whole of the testator's estate was expressed at the sum of £53,468 0s. 5d., of which sum £33,141 14s. 11d. represented the value of the pure personalty. Edward Boards Knight, to whom the testator's residuary real and personal estate was given, claimed such portion of the annuity fund as the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution, a charitable corporation, could not take.

Micklethwait for the executors of the testator's heir-at-law and one of his next of kin.

NORTH, J.—In the present case the bequest of the annuity must be treated upon the footing that under the terms of the will the personal estate was primarily liable to make up the annuity fund. [His LORDSHIP read the will and continued:] Having regard to the long series of cases, of which Greville v. Browne (1) may be cited as an example, it cannot be disputed that the direction to the trustees to hold the proceeds of the sale and conversion of the testator's real and personal estate after, and subject to, the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies, and after making due provision for the annuity, on trust for E. B. Knight, has the effect of charging the legacies and the annuity upon the real estate; but that may mean that they are to be thrown upon the real estate pari passu with the personalty, or only in aid of the personalty, if the personalty is insufficient.

What is the meaning here? Under the will, down to this point, the annuity is payable out of personalty only. Then there is this gift. What is the gift? To construe the words strictly, the gift is only of the net proceeds arising from the sale and conversion remaining after something has been taken out of the gross proceeds; i.e., it is not a gift of the whole fund, subject to certain payments being made out of it, but it is a gift of what is left, being the net proceeds after such payments have been made. But there is nothing here directing these payments to be made. That is provided for in the earlier part of the will. In this latter part the testator, having something still left to dispose of, gives it as the net proceeds left after the payments previously directed have been made. I do not see how this gift of what is described as the net proceeds can be said to mean the entire proceeds, or if not the entire proceeds, anything else than what is left after all other payments previously directed have been made.

I think that the testator uses the phrase "net proceeds" here in precisely the same way in which JAMES, L.J., used the same words in Elliott v. Dearsley (2), and I refer to them, not as deciding a point of law, but as illustrating the use of language. He says there (16 Ch.D. at pp. 329, 330):

"The reasonable view of his intention is that he considered that the mortgages on the estates which were to be immediately sold would be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of those estates, and that the net proceeds only would go into the mixed fund out of which the estates that were not to be sold at once would be exonerated."

There he uses the words "net proceeds," referring to what was left after various payments had been taken from the gross proceeds. So here, after the expenses of the sale, the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies and annuity have been provided for, we arrive at the ultimate gift of the net proceeds to Edward Boards Knight. That being so, it seems to me there is not any direction whatever for the payment of legacies or of the annuity out of the net proceeds of the sale and conversion, because those net proceeds are what is left after those payments have been made. That being so, Elliott v. Dearsley (2) seems to me to be precisely in point, as this is a case in which the annuity is not ordered to be paid out of any mixed fund arising from the conversion of the real and personal estate, but out of a sum directed to be set apart for the purpose out of the personal estate.

There is nothing in this clause indicating more than that, if necessary, the real estate might be resorted to: I do not find any words indicating that any payment is to be made out of the real estate and the personal estate pari passu, or rather I should say any direction for the payment of the annuity or legacies out of the real estate. Under these circumstances Elliott v. Dearsley (2) is directly in point, and, as the observations of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Gainsford v. Dunn (3) (L.R. 17 Eq. at p. 408), seem to me to be somewhat inconsistent with that case, I must follow the later decision of the Court of Appeal. [His LORDSHIP then decided that Edward Boards Knight, as residuary legatee, took so much of the legacy to the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution as that charity was not entitled to take; and made a declaration that the annuity fund was payable primarily out of personal estate, and was only payable out of realty in the event of a deficiency of the personalty; and that so much of the annuity fund as was attributable to realty and impure personalty went to Edward Boards Knight as residuary devisee and legatee.]

Limitation of Action—Landlord and tenant—Tenant at will—No rent paid by tenant—Exclusive occupation—Entry by landlord to do repairs—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 7.

On the death of his son, the owner of a row of cottages permitted the defendant, who was the wife of the deceased son, to occupy one of the cottages rent free, telling her that she could "live in it always rent free." For thirteen years the defendant occupied the cottage rent free; her name was in the rate book and she paid the parish rates; she did most, if not all, of the internal repairs at her own expense; and she never made a written acknowledgment of the owner's title to the cottage. The owner paid the water rates, property tax, and insurance premium. On four occasions during the defendant's possession the owner, when he was executing external repairs to adjoining cottages, carried out similar repairs to the defendant's premises. On these occasions he entered the premises with the defendants knowledge, but without asking for or obtaining the defendant's consent. He also carried out internal repairs on one occasion in the same manner. Apart from paying some fees for the education of the defendant's children and medical fees for one of the children and paying for its burial, the owner left the management of the cottage to the defendant. On the owner's death the cottages were left to trustees on trust for the plaintiff, who was the owner's step-daughter, for life, and she claimed possession and caused a notice to quit to be served on the defendant.

Held: on the facts the defendant was not a guest of the owner, but a tenant at will, and that tenancy had not been determined by the owner entering without her consent to carry out repairs; moreover, since the defendant had been in continuous occupation for thirteen years, the plaintiff's right to the property was barred under s. 7 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 [repealed], as amended by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 [repealed].

Appeal by the defendant from Leicester County Court in an action brought against her by the plaintiffs for the possession of the cottage at 27, Walnut Street, Leicester. The plaintiffs were the trustees and a beneficiary of the estate of John Smith, deceased, the former owner of the premises.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for possession of the premises and £7 10s. mesne profits and found as follows: (i) That the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between John Snaith and the defendant; that John Snaith was at times in actual and at all other times in constructive possession of the house throughout the period in question, and that the defendant's occupation was not exclusive and was that of a licensee and not of a tenant; that the fact that she was rated as being the person in apparent occupation and paid the occupier's rates was not conclusive that she occupied as tenant, and that the present case was in principle similar to that of Peakin v. Peakin (1). (ii) That, assuming that the defendant occupied the house as tenant at will, such tenancy was determined every time the landlord entered the premises to do repairs, as he was not under any contract to repair and did not ask or obtain permission from the defendant to enter the premises for the purpose, but entered by his agents and workmen of his own motion and in exercise of his right to resume possession whenever he thought proper; that sending workmen on to the premises and doing repairs thereon was more than a "mere entry," such as is referred to in s. 10 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833; that during the occupation by the landlord's workmen the defendant had no exclusive possession; and that on each withdrawal of the landlord's agents a new tenancy at will or on sufferance commenced by implied grant. (iii) That the defendant by allowing John Snaith to enter and lay out money on the premises as his property without protest, and by requesting him (on at least one occasion) to do repairs to the house as owner thereof, is estopped from setting up that at those times the Statute of Limitations was running in her favour.

After the judge had given judgment, but before it was entered, the plaintiff's solicitor applied to add the trustees as co-plaintiffs together with the beneficiary in whose name the proceedings had been instituted. The solicitor for the defendant objected, but the judge found that, having regard to s. 24 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the joinder was immaterial as between the plaintiff and the defendant and that the trustees were entitled to be added, and so he made an order joining them under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11. Judgment was then entered in favour of all the plaintiffs.

The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 [repealed] provides :

"Section 7. When any person shall be in possession . . . of any land . . . as tenant at will, the right of the person entitled subject thereto or of the person through whom he claims . . . to bring an action to recover such land . . . shall be deemed to have first accrued either at the determination of such tenancy or at the expiration of one year next after the commencement of such tenancy, at which time such tenancy shall be deemed to have determined."

"Section 10. No person shall be deemed to have been in possession of any land within the meaning of this Act merely by reason of having made an entry thereon."

By the Rules of the Supreme Court Ord. 16 :

"Rule 2. Where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff . . . the court or a judge may, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through a bona fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as may be just."

"Rule 11. No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that . . . the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined . . . be added."

Corner for the plaintiffs.

LAWRANCE, J.—The first point in this case is, whether the defendant was tenant at will of the house here in question or occupied it merely as the guest of John Snaith. I think it is clear on the facts that she was tenant at will. She paid most of the rates and she did the internal repairs, and she was in no way interfered with in her occupation by John Snaith. This being so, and she having been in possession over thirteen years, the statute of limitations has run in her favour unless there has been an interruption in its operation. It is said that there has been; that the entry of John Snaith to do repairs from time to time constituted interruptions. This was one of a row of cottages belonging to Snaith. When he repaired the others he repaired this one. It seems to me he no more resumed the possession of this cottage than of the others when he did the repairs. This entry was not contrary to the defendant's wish. On the contrary, it is evident she was desirous that he should enter more often than he was willing to do repairs. All he did was intended not as a taking of possession, but merely as a kindness to her. I can see no evidence to support the finding of the county court judge, and I think the appeal must be allowed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we must give judgment for the defendant on the merits. There is, therefore, no need to decide as to the second point. However, I may just say that I think the amendment by adding the trustees as co-plaintiffs could be made at the stage it was made. Judgment then had been pronounced, but it had not been entered. Whether it was final judgment or not, the case was not disposed of till judgment was entered; there was still, in the words of FRY, L.J., something to do.

As to the other point, I think it is fairly clear when the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, is looked at. It is, I think, clear on the face of it that the possession of the defendant was the possession of an occupier, and not the constructive possession of the owner. Probably under the old statute of limitations the possession would have been held to be not adverse, and, therefore, that no title could accrue under that statute. But the doctrine of non-adverse possession is now done away with. The tenancy of the defendant was or commenced as a tenancy at will. As to tenancies at will, there was rather a peculiar special provision in the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. That provision was s. 7. [His LORDSHIP read s. 7, and continued:] The effect of this is that if a person comes into possession as tenant at will and continues in possession for thirteen years without paying rent, he acquires the ownership of the land by the joint effect of that statute and the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 [repealed]. It was clear here there was a tenancy at will—the statement that the defendant might occupy the house rent free was sufficient to show that. The possession was the possession of the occupier, and not of the owner. The case in no way resembles those in which a servant or agent of the owner had held the possession for him.

Clearly, then, the county court judge was wrong. And we can review his decision, though in many ways it may have been a decision on a question of fact. In an action of ejectment the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff. Accordingly the burden here lies on the plaintiff to show that Snaith took possession of the house when he carried out the repairs. There is no evidence of that. There is no evidence his entry to do the repairs was against the wish of the defendant. There was no actual objection in fact, and in fact objection to it on her part was very unlikely. In Doe d. Bennett v. Turner (2) there was objection on the occupier's part, and that just made the whole difference. If it had been shown that the defendant was in occupation on the express terms that she should do all the internal repairs, that would probably have taken the case out of the statute, as the obligation to do the repairs might be held to be equivalent to rent. Probably the judge was misled by the Irish case of Peakin v. Peakin (1). That case is not on all fours with this, and I may add it seems to me doubtful.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Sir Francis Jeune, P.), July 4, 1898]

[Reported 78 L.T. 796]

Variation of Settlement—Settlement in favour of petitioner to provide for children of marriage and in default to give petitioner absolute control of settled property—No children of marriage—Dissolution of marriage—Re-conveyance of property to petitioner.

Where the real substance of a settlement in favour of a petitioner is to provide for any children of the marriage and in default of children to give the petitioner absolute control of the property, there is no issue of the marriage, and the petitioner has obtained a decree absolute of divorce, the court may order that the trustees re-convey the property comprised in the settlement to the petitioner.

Application for the confirmation of the registrar's report recommending that the settled property of the petitioner, Marianne Aubrey Wynne should be re-conveyed to her by the trustees of the settlement freed from the trusts of the settlement.

The petitioner obtained on Oct. 27, 1894, a decree nisi dissolving her marriage with the respondent, Llewelyn Malcolm Wynne, on the ground of his adultery and desertion, and on May 9, 1898, the decree was made absolute. The petitioner applied for variation of an ante-nuptial settlement dated Jan. 10, 1881. The wife under this settlement brought certain property into trust. Among other limitations it was provided that in the event of failure of issue of the marriage the wife's settled property subject to the previous interests created by the settlement should go as she should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment if she survived her husband to her absolutely, but if she died in the lifetime of her husband in trust for such person or persons as at her decease would have become entitled to her personal estate under the statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates if she had died intestate and unmarried and domiciled in England. There was no issue of the marriage. The registrar recommended that the wife's settled property should be re-conveyed to her by the trustees of the settlement freed from the trusts of the settlement.

Herbert Robertson and J. C. Priestley for the petitioner.

F. Whinney for the respondent's trustee in bankruptcy.

Lewis Coward and Gwynne Hall for the trustees of the settlement.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I think I can accede to this application for the confirmation of the registrar's report. It seems to me that I can do so on the authority of Meredyth v. Meredyth and Leigh (1). This settlement gives a possible interest to the next of kin, and the only question which I have to consider is whether I shall be unduly interfering with their interest. The real substance of the settlement is to provide for any children of the marriage, and in default of children to give the petitioner absolute control of the property. There have been no children of the marriage and the purpose of the settlement has substantially failed. I think I shall only be following the rule laid down in Meredyth v. Meredyth and Leigh (1), and acting on the true principles governing these cases if I order the trustees to re-convey the property as recommended by the registrar. I shall, therefore, confirm the registrar's report.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), November 15, 1895]

Bankruptcy—Committee of inspection—Solicitor—Member employed as agent to trustees' solicitor—Retrospective sanction of court—Solicitor's right to profit derived from transaction arising out of bankruptcy—Office expenses—Disbursements.

A solicitor, a member of the committee of inspection of the bankrupt's estate, did work as agent of the firm of solicitors of the trustee without having previously obtained the sanction of the court as required by r. 317, of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

Held: (i) the court had no power to give its sanction after the work had been done, and the solicitor was not entitled to derive any profit therefrom; (ii) the whole of the solicitor's bill of costs, except disbursements, was "profit," and nothing could be allowed for office expenses.

Bankruptcy—Committee of inspection—Solicitor—Retainer by committee—Solicitor's clerk member of committee—Setting aside retainer.

Per LORD ESHER, M.R. : Where a solicitor accepted a retainer from a committee of inspection, one member of which was a clerk in his employ, an immediate application to the court to set aside the retainer ought to be granted.

Notes. Rule 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, has been replaced by r. 350 (2) of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952.

Referred to : Re Spink, Ex parte Slater (1913), 108 L.T. 811.

As to powers exercisable without the consent of the committee of inspection, see 2 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 384 et seq.; and for cases see 4 DIGEST (Repl.) 267 et seq.

Appeal by Miss H. Gallard, a creditor, from an order of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in bankruptcy, varying the certificate of taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs in the bankruptcy, and holding that in addition to being repaid for out-of-pocket expenses, the solicitor was entitled to £75 for the expense of keeping up an office and a staff of clerks, and that only £40 could fairly be regarded as profit made out of the transaction, and therefore only £40 was disallowed.

In 1887 a receiving order was made against George Gallard, and in October, 1887, a trustee was appointed by the creditors with a committee of inspection. One of the members of the committee of inspection was a Mr. Williams, a solicitor, and a member of the firm of Cooper and Williams, at Brighton; another member was Mr. Hunt, managing clerk to Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. The committee of inspection appointed Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. solicitors to the trustee.

A In the course of the bankruptcy it became necessary for Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. to employ an agent at Brighton, and they accordingly arranged with Mr. Williams that he should act as their agent there on the usual agency terms. No sanction of the court was obtained for this arrangement.

B Mr. Williams did the work and sent in to the trustee's solicitors an agency bill of costs for £139, which Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. paid. The trustee claimed to be reimbursed out of the estate. In re-taxing the bill, which was ordered upon the application of a creditor, the master, acting upon r. 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, disallowed the whole sum except out-of-pocket expenses.

The Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 317 [see now Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 350 (2)], provided as follows :

C "No member of a committee of inspection of an estate shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy."

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Æneas Macintosh for the creditor.

D Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the trustee.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—Notwithstanding the great experience and knowledge of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., I think with all deference that we ought not to agree with his decision in this case. There are two points arising here. The sanction of the court is required, under r. 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, in order to entitle a member of a committee of inspection of a bankrupt's estate to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy. That sanction was not obtained by Mr. Williams before he did the work in respect of which we are asked to disallow the profits claimed by him. The learned judge was of opinion that the sanction of the court could be given after the transactions had closed. It seems to me that, upon the true construction of r. 317, the learned judge was wrong in so holding. E In my opinion, the sanction of the court must be obtained under that rule before a member of the committee of inspection of an estate has done any of the things in respect of which he claims any profit. Mr. Williams did not earn his profits "under and with the sanction of the court," and, since the court has no power to give its sanction subsequently, we must hold that he is not entitled to any profit for the work he has done in the bankruptcy.

G I think that Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. made a mistake in employing Mr. Williams as their agent. The learned judge said that he thought that they did not mean to do anything wrong, and I accept that. No blemish upon their honour arises from what they did, but they certainly made a mistake in employing as their agent a member of the committee of inspection without first obtaining the sanction of the court. It has been argued that the work which he did was very H beneficial to the estate. I do not doubt it. But the question here is, whether he can be allowed to make any profit out of the matter, and whether he is entitled to be paid anything except in respect of disbursements. The learned judge agreed that Mr. Williams was not entitled to any profit, but he decided that the other charges in his bill of costs besides disbursement were not all profits. Mr. Williams has to keep up an office and a staff of clerks, and so the learned judge held that an allow- I ance ought to be made for these office expenses, and that the only profit arising out of the work done was the amount of the bill of costs less these office expenses and disbursements. That is a very dangerous view to take. The profits of a solicitor are that which he claims to be paid, less his disbursements. I cannot agree with the very lenient view taken by the learned judge. Everything in the bill must be taken off except in respect of disbursements, and this appeal must be allowed.

There is another important question raised in this case. Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co., without any wrong intent, accepted a retainer from the committee of inspection of which one of their clerks was a member. That does not seem to me to be good practice. It was a mistake on their part. They should have immediately obtained the sanction of the court. Though it is not necessary for me to decide the point now, my view certainly is that, if a solicitor accepts a retainer from a committee of inspection when one of the members of the committee is in such close relations with him as their clerk was to Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co., an application made at once to the court that the retainer be set aside ought to be granted by the court in the exercise of its inherent powers.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The true construction of r. 317 is an important matter. I understand it to mean that the sanction of the court must be obtained before, not after, the work is done in respect of which a profit is claimed. The sanction of the court is a condition precedent to the making of profits. In the present case Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co., without obtaining the sanction of the court, employed Mr. Williams as their agent at Brighton, he being a member of the committee of inspection. No doubt he was well acquainted with the details of the bankruptcy, and his employment was in some respects a proper one. But Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. made a mistake in employing him while he was a member of the committee of inspection. He comes within the provisions of r. 317, and therefore, he is not entitled to derive any profit from that which he did as agent for Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co. in this bankruptcy. No question is raised as to his payment in respect of disbursements. The only question is as to a sum of about £115. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., came to the conclusion that Mr. Williams was entitled to the whole of that sum except £40, which, he decided, represented the profit arising from the work done. The rest of that sum, about £75, the learned judge attributed to the expenses of the office and clerks, and he held that that sum was not profit. I cannot understand that decision. It seems to me that the outgoings of the office could not in any way be attributed to the expenses of the bankruptcy. All that the solicitor can claim to be paid is out-of-pocket expenses. Everything else in his bill is profit. The learned judge was wrong in deducting only £40; he should have deducted everything except disbursements. I, therefore, agree that the appeal must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—The duties of the committee of inspection of a bankrupt's estate are obvious. They are to watch over the administration of the bankruptcy, and to control, to any extent they may think right, that which may be done by the trustee or the solicitor or anyone else who takes part in the administration. That being so, r. 317 was passed. I entirely agree with what has been said as to its construction. The words seem to me to be very clear. A member of the committee is not to derive any profit from any transaction "except under and with the sanction of the court." That means, he must have the sanction of the court at the time he is engaged in the transactions from which he hopes to derive profit. It cannot be said that the court can give its sanction afterwards. That would be contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the rule. The sanction must be obtained before any work is done by a member of a committee of inspection which would be profitable to him. That is my reading of the rule. In the present case Mr. Williams was a member of the committee of inspection, and never obtained the sanction of the court before acting as agent to Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co., who were solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy. They arranged with him that he should act as their agent at Brighton on the usual agency terms, and they have paid him money for so acting. It is completely against the spirit of the rule that he should receive any profit for what he has done as agent for the trustee's solicitors. His duty, as a member of the committee, to keep down the expenses of the bankruptcy, conflicts with his own interest to incur expenses and make a profit. That is the very mischief that the rule was intended to get rid of.

Then it is said that the learned judge has not allowed Mr. Williams any profit. He has, in fact, allowed him not only his disbursements, but a sum of about £75 which is said not to be profit. Mr. Williams has an office and clerks, and he asks that the cost of keeping up his office and clerks should be attributed to the expenses of the work he has done, and that only the balance of his bill should be treated as profit. It is the first time I have ever heard that suggestion made. If he were allowed to pay for the costs of keeping up an office and a staff of clerks out of that which he says is not profit, his interest would be in direct conflict with his duty as a member of the committee of inspection to keep down the expenses of the administration. I am of opinion that the £75 which the learned judge allowed were profits arising from work done by Mr. Williams, and the learned judge had no power to allow anything in respect of office expenses. Rule 317 is imperative. As the £75 were improperly allowed, we must now order that that amount be struck out of the bill.

Bill of Exchange—Forgery—Forgery of endorsements—Acceptance and payment to bona fide holders for value in belief that endorsements genuine—Right to recover as money paid under mistake of fact—Delay—Change in position of holders.

Where the drawee of a bill of exchange accepts the bill with forged endorsements on it in the belief that such endorsements are genuine, and in the same belief pays the bill at maturity to a bona fide holder for value, he cannot afterwards, if such an interval has elapsed that the position of the holder may have been altered, recover his money as money paid under a mistake of fact.

A bill of exchange was drawn in three parts, two of which were stolen, and, after endorsements had been forged, one draft was presented for acceptance by a bona fide holder and was accepted by the plaintiffs. In the belief that the endorsements were genuine and that they were liable on the bill, and without any negligence on their part, the plaintiffs paid the bill at maturity to the defendants who were bona fide holders for value. After the discovery of the theft and forgeries some months later, the third part of the bill was presented, and, this being a genuine bill, the plaintiffs paid it. Having without negligence paid the bill twice, the plaintiffs sought repayment from the defendants of the money paid by them in respect of the first draft as money paid under a mistake of fact.

Held: an interval having elapsed during which the position of the defendants had altered, the plaintiffs could not recover the sum paid to the defendants as money paid under a mistake of fact.

Action by the plaintiffs, the London and River Plate Bank, Ltd., brought to recover from the defendants, the Bank of Liverpool and Messrs. Larrinaga & Co. £261 0s. 11d., alleged to have been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under a mistake of fact, and which the plaintiffs sought to recover as money paid under a mistake of fact. The plaintiffs claimed the sum as the amount of first of exchange in favour of Fueyo & Co., accepted by the plaintiffs and paid to the defendants either personally or by their agents for that purpose under the mistake of fact that the endorsements thereon were genuine, and that the person presenting the same was the lawful holder thereof.

On April 18, 1893, Hipolito Garcia, a merchant of Monte Video, who was desirous of making a remittance to a firm of Fueyo & Co., in Havana, purchased a draft drawn by the Monte Video branch of the plaintiff bank on the head office in London, for £261 0s. 11d., payable 120 days after date to the order of Fueyo & Co. of Havana. The bill was issued in three parts in the usual way, and Hipolito Garcia forwarded two parts of the draft to his correspondents Fueyo & Co., in payment of an account. These drafts never reached their destination, and they appear to have been stolen in their transit through the post office. Subsequently, a person, who called himself Pedro Garcia, appeared at Havana, having with him the first and second of exchange, and he called there upon a firm of Loychate & Co., and produced the draft which purported to be indorsed to him, first from Fueyo & Co. to Hipolito Garcia and then by Hipolito Garcia to him, and he asked Loychate & Co. to buy the bill on London. They did not know much about Pedro Garcia, and they, therefore, intimated to him that before they paid the amount of the bill they would like to know whether or not it would be accepted in England. Pedro Garcia fell in with that proposal, and accordingly the bill was, at the request of Loychate & Co., endorsed to the firm of Larrinaga & Co. in Liverpool. Larrinaga & Co. presented the bill for acceptance to the plaintiffs, and the bill was accepted by the plaintiffs, and upon intimation of that fact Loychate & Co. paid the amount of the bill to Pedro Garcia, who thereupon disappeared, and had not since been heard of. The bill having in this way reached the hands of Larrinaga & Co., they in the usual course of business, discounted the bill with the Bank of Liverpool, and handed them the bill endorsed by themselves, and were credited with the amount at the time when the bill was so transferred. The bill matured about a fortnight after, and it was then presented by the Bank of Liverpool to the plaintiff bank, and was paid by them on Aug. 19, 1893. It was admitted that the Bank of Liverpool and Larrinaga & Co. had acted in perfect good faith, and it was asserted by the plaintiffs that they had paid the bill under the impression that it was a genuine bill upon which they were liable. Some time after Fueyo & Co., who expected to be paid the amount of their bill by Hipolito Garcia, informed him that they had received no remittance. Then it was discovered that the original first and second of exchange had been stolen, and had been dealt with in the way mentioned. Hipolito Garcia then sent to Fueyo & Co. the third of exchange—that being a genuine bill—and that was forwarded with the proper indorsements to the plaintiffs, and they were compelled to pay it and did pay it in July, 1894. The plaintiffs, therefore, paid the draft twice over, and under the circumstances they demanded from the Bank of Liverpool and from Larrinaga & Co. repayment of the money that they had handed over in discharge of the first and second of exchange, which they said they had paid under a mistake of fact.

Nov. 6, 1895. MATHEW, J.—This action is brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the Bank of Liverpool and from a firm of Larrinaga & Co., the sum of £261, the amount of a draft which had been accepted by the plaintiff bank, and which they had paid, but which they allege they paid under a mistake of fact. It appeared a long time after payment had been made that the endorsements on the draft were forgeries, and it followed that the plaintiffs were not liable on the draft at the time they paid it. It is admitted that the Bank of Liverpool and Larrinaga & Co., had become possessed of the bill in good faith, and so far as they were concerned, they were as ignorant as the plaintiffs of the fact that the endorsements were forged.

It was argued for the plaintiffs that if it could be shown that the plaintiffs had not been negligent when they paid the money over, it might be recovered from the Bank of Liverpool, or from Larrinaga & Co. It was agreed that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs; that when they paid the bill they paid it under the impression that it was a genuine bill, and that there were no means whatever of ascertaining that the endorsements on the bill were a forgery. It was said that the substance of the rule that where there was no negligence in a case of this sort, the acceptor paying a forged bill, could get the money back, was recognised in the early case of Price v. Neale (1).

In that case the acceptor of the bill—I am referring to one only of the two bills therein mentioned—in the belief that the signature of the drawer was genuine, paid the amount. The bill turned out to be a forgery, and in an action to recover the money paid to the holder, LORD MANSFIELD said that the acceptor was bound to know the drawer's handwriting. From that it was urged that the foundation of the liability of the plaintiff in such a case was negligence, and that if there was no negligence the acceptor was entitled to recover the money back. But that is not the decision. If the forgery were cleverly executed one does not see how it is possible that the acceptor should know it was a forgery, and it would seem extraordinary that the right of the acceptor to recover the money paid to the holder should depend upon whether or not the forgery was cleverly executed. It was not said in that case that there had been negligence, nor was it said that if there had been no negligence the action would lie. Neither of those two propositions is laid down, and one or other would have been indispensable to the position taken up for the plaintiffs. The principle underlying the decision in that case seems to me to be this, that if the plaintiff in that case so conducted himself as to lead the holder of the bill to believe that he considered the signature genuine, he could not afterwards withdraw from that position; and no single case has been produced in which, where payment had been made on a forged endorsement to the holder in good faith, the money has been recovered back. That case was followed by Smith v. Mercer (2), where it was said in the course of some of the judgments, that where a banker had paid a forged draft, believing that it had been accepted by his customer, he ought to know his customer's signature. The banker may not be able by any amount of care to ascertain whether or not the acceptance was a forgery, and the same observations I have made with regard to the former case apply to this also, and neither case establishes the principle contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs.

The true principle is developed in the clearest possible form in Cocks v. Masterman (3). There was an intermediate case of Wilkinson v. Johnson (4), which stands by itself, and which we need not discuss. In Cocks v. Masterman (3) the simple rule was laid down in clear language for the first time that, when a bill becomes due and is presented for payment, the holder ought to know at once whether the bill is going to be paid or not. If the mistake is discovered instantly, it may be the money can be recovered back, but if it be not and the money is paid in good faith and is received in good faith, and there is an interval of time, in which the position of the holder may be altered, the principle seems to apply that money once paid cannot be recovered back. That rule is obviously, as it seems to me, indispensable for the conduct of business. A holder of a bill cannot possibly fail to have his position affected if there be any interval of time during which he holds the money as his own, or spends it as his own, and he is subsequently sought to be made responsible to hand it back. It may be that no legal right may be compromised by reason of the payment. For instance, the acceptor may pay the bill, and discover on the same day that the bill is a forgery, and so inform the holder of it, so that the holder should have time to give notice of dishonour to the other parties to the bill; but, even in such a case, it is manifest that the position of a man of business may be most seriously compromised even by the delay of a day. That clear rule is one that ought not to be tampered with. It is one of the few rules of business which is perfectly clear and distinct at present, and, as I have always understood, it is unimpeachable, and it has been recognised in Mather v. Lord Maidstone (5).

In the case before me there cannot be a question that the position of the Bank of Liverpool would be seriously compromised if they were now compelled to repay this money because it was not until months afterwards that it was discovered that there was anything wrong with the bill, and meanwhile the Bank of Liverpool had lost their right of giving notice to Larrinaga & Co., that the bill had not been paid. I now come to refer to the exact position of the Bank of Liverpool in the matter. The Bank of Liverpool and Larrinaga & Co., are both made defendants, and the plaintiff's counsel was called upon to elect as to which he was proceeding against. If Larrinaga & Co. had handed the bill for collection to the Bank of Liverpool, they would be the proper defendants on the assumption of liability. If, on the other hand, the Bank of Liverpool were the holders of the bill by endorsement from Larrinaga & Co., the Bank of Liverpool would be the persons to be sued, on the same assumption of liability. In this case I am satisfied that the Bank of Liverpool were holders of the bill; that payment was made to them, and that, therefore, they are entitled to retain the money. Therefore, I think this action fails, and I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

BRAY v. FORD

Court of Appeal—New trial—Miscarriage—Misdirection—Libel—Measure of damages.

By R.S.C. Ord. 39, r. 6 [see now R.S.C. Ord. 58, r. 10, sub-r. (2)] : "A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence . . . unless in the opinion of the court . . . some substantial wrong or miscarriage has thereby been occasioned in the trial. . . ."

In an action for libel, if the judge so directs the jury as to lead them to take such an erroneous view of any material part of the alleged libel as may have affected their minds in considering what damages they shall award, there is a substantial "miscarriage" within the meaning of R.S.C. Ord. 39, r. 6, and a new trial must be ordered, though the court should be of opinion that other parts of the alleged libel were sufficient to justify the damages actually given.

Notes. The power of the Court of Appeal to order a new trial on the ground of misdirection is now governed by R.S.C. Ord. 58, r. 10, sub-r. (2).

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.), refusing a new trial in an action for libel resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff with £600 damages.

The plaintiff, who was a solicitor and justice of the peace in Leeds, and the defendant were for many years members of the Leeds Liberal Club and were both interested in the Yorkshire College, to the funds of which they had largely subscribed. The plaintiff was a governor and vice-chairman of the council of the college, and had acted as its solicitor, receiving profit costs for his services. At first he made a present of his time and labour to the college, but after entering into partnership with another solicitor in 1878 he considered that he was not at liberty to do so. He informed the college of this, and bills of costs were afterwards delivered to and charged against the college in the usual way. The total amount of profit received by the plaintiff on these bills, which covered the period from 1879 to 1893, was £103 10s., but his annual subscriptions during the same period considerably exceeded that amount. The defendant, having learned that the plaintiff received profit costs, wrote to him a letter which constituted the alleged libel, and circulated it among more than 300 governors of the college and certain other persons. The letter began thus :—

Leeds, Feb. 26, 1894.

“Sir,—During last summer, as you are aware, it came to my knowledge that, whilst holding the fiduciary position of vice-chairman of the Yorkshire College, you were illegally and improperly, as you know, making profit as its paid solicitor.”

Then followed comments which a jury would be justified in regarding as gravely libellous.

The plaintiff brought an action for libel, and at the trial at Leeds before CAVE, J., and a special jury, it was contended on his behalf that under the articles of association of the college he was entitled to profit costs, notwithstanding the fact that he held the fiduciary position of director of the institution. CAVE, J., directed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to take profit costs from the college, and the jury assessed the damages at £600. The Court of Appeal held that although there had been a misdirection on the construction of the articles of association of the college, and the plaintiff was not entitled to take profit costs, there were imputations in the letter sufficient to sustain the verdict, and therefore that there had been no substantial wrong or miscarriage within the meaning of Ord. 39, r. 6, and refused a new trial. The defendant appealed.
